AN INCIDENT ON THE CONGO.

long ago, a missionary on the great Congo had pushed up on a little river into a part where no white man had been before. The anchor was let and the steamer brought to. Food was sent for the men, and firewood for fires. The natives came crowding to the bank to look at this wonderful thing they were armed with arrows, and spears. The missionary tried to speak to them, and made signs of peace. But they were so suspicious, and partly afraid, that he could do seemed to touch it was plain that they were partly suspicious, and partly afraid, when savages are in that state, they are very dangerous. What was to be done? A happy thought flashed across the missionary. He had his wife and a dear little baby on board! he got the baby, took it up in his arms, and showed it to the people. Now, the baby was a really sensible one; it seemed to understand the situation, and instead of crying, or pretending to be shy, it laughed and crowed as merrily as could be, and when the poor savages saw it, they felt safe; they understood in a moment that no harm was meant, and so they laid down their arms, and became quite friendly. Even in Africa we can say, "A little child shall lead them."

MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND.

FATHER, I know that all my life
Is portion'd out for me,
And the changes that are sure to come
I do not fear to see;
But I ask Thee for a present mind, Intent on pleasing Thee.

I ask Thee for a thoughtful love,
Through constant watching wise,
To meet the glad with joyful smiles,
And wipe the weeping eyes;
And a heart at leisure from itself,
To soothe and sympathize.

I would not have the restless will
That hurries to and fro,
Seeking for some great thing to do,
Or secret thing to know:
I would be treated as a child,
And guided where I go.

Wherever in the world I am,
In whatso'er estate,
I have a fellowship with hearts
To keep and cultivate;
And a work of lowly love to do
For the Lord on whom I wait.

So I ask Thee for the daily strength
To none that ask denied,
And a mind to blend with outward life
While keeping at Thy side;
Content to fill a little space,
If Thou be glorified.

And if some things I do not ask
In my cup of blessing be,
I would have my spirit fill'd the more
With grateful love to Thee—
More careful, not to serve Thee much
But to please Thee perfectly

There are briars besetting every path,
That call for patient care;
There is a cross in every lot,
And an earnest need for prayer;
But a lowly heart, that leans on Thee,
Is happy anywhere.

In a service which Thy will appoints
There are no bonds for me:
For my inmost heart is taught the truth
That makes Thy children free;
And a life of self-renouncing love
Is a life of liberty.

AMONG THE BEDOUINS.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED LAST SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1890, AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" SERVICE IN THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Life in Tents—Scripture Imagery of Tent-Dwellings—The Howls of the Hyenas at Night—Hovering Birds of Prey—The Mourners Among the Tombs—The Most Famous Well in History—Jacob Digging His Own Well—The Advantage of a Man Having a Well of His Own—A Visit to Mount Gerizim—The Journey to Shiloh—The Meadow of the Feast—A Famous Battlefield—A Battle Yet to be Fought There.

"Forasmuch as thou knowest we are to encamp in the wilderness." Numbers 10:31.

NIGHT after night we have slept in tent in Palestine. There are large villages of Bedouins without a house, and for three thousand years the people of those places have lived in black tents, made out of dyed skins, and when the winds and storms wore out and tore loose those coverings, others of the same kind took their places. Noah lived in a tent. Abraham in a tent. Jacob pitched his tent on the mountain. Isaac pitched his tent in the valley. Lot pitched his tent toward Sodom. In a tent the woman Jael nailed Sisera, the general, to the ground, first having given him sour milk to make him soundly sleep, that being the effect of such nutrition, as modern travellers can testify. The Syrian army in a tent. The ancient battle-shout was, "To your tents, O Israel!" Paul was a tent-maker. Indeed, Isaiah, magnificently poetic, indicates that all the human race live under a blue tent when he says that God "stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in," and Ezekiah compares death to the striking of a tent, saying, "My age is removed from me as a shepherd's tent."

In our tent in Palestine to-night I hear something I never heard before and hope never to hear again. It is the voice of a hyena amid the rocks near by. When you may have seen this monster putting his mouth between the iron bars of a menagerie, he is a captive and he gives a humiliated and suppressed cry. But yonder in the midnight on a throne of rocks he has nothing to fear, and he utters himself in a loud, resounding, terrific, almost supernatural sound, splitting up the darkness into a deeper midnight. It begins with a howl and ends with a sound something like a horse's whinnying. In the hyena's voice are defiance and strength and blood-thirstiness and crunch of broken bones and death.

I am glad to say that for the most part Palestine is clear of beasts of prey. The leopards, which Jeremiah says cannot change their spots, have all disappeared and the lions that once were common all through this land and used by all the prophets for illustrations of cruelty and wrath, have retreated before the discharges of gunpowder of which they have an indescribable fear. But for the most part Palestine is what it originally was. With the one exception of a wire thread reaching from Joppa to Jerusalem and from Jerusalem to Nazareth and from Nazareth to Tiberias and from Tiberias to Damascus, that one nerve of civilization the telegraphic wire (for we found ourselves only a few minutes off from Brooklyn and New York while standing by Lake Galilee)—with that one exception, Palestine is just as it always was.

Nothing surprised me so much as the persistence of everything. A sheep or horse falls dead and, though the sky may one minute before be clear of all wings, in five minutes after, the skies are black with eagles contending for largest morsels of the extinct quadruped. Ah, now I understand the force of Christ's illustration when He said: "Whosoever the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together." The longevity of those eagles is wonderful. They live fifty or sixty and sometimes a hundred years. Ah, that explains what David meant when he says, "Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's." I saw a shepherd with the folds of his coat far bent outward and I wondered what was contained in that amplitude of apparel and I said to the dragoman, "What has that shepherd got under his coat?" And the dragoman said: "It is a very young lamb he is carrying, it is too young and too weak and too cold to keep up with the flock." At that moment I saw the lamb put its head out from the shepherd's bosom and I said, "There it is now, Isaiah's description of the tenderness of God—He shall gather the lambs with His arm and carry them in His bosom."

Jesus and the Woman of Samaria at Jacob's Well.

Passing by a village home, in the Holy Land, about noon, I saw a great crowd in and around a private house, and I said to the dragoman: "David, what is going on there?" He said: "Somebody has recently died there and their neighbors go in for several days after to sit down and weep with the bereaved." "There it is," I said, "the old scriptural custom: 'And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother.'" Early in the morning passing by a cemetery in the Holy Land, I saw among the graves about fifty women dressed in black, and they were crying: "Oh, my child!" "Oh, my husband!" "Oh, my father!" "Oh, my mother!" Our dragoman told us that every morning very early for mornings after a burial, the women go to the sepulchre, and after that every week very for a year. As I saw this group just after break, I said: "There it is again, the same custom referred to in Luke, the evangelist where he says; 'certain women which came early at the sepulchre.'"

But here we found ourselves at Jacob's the most famous well in history, most distinguished for two things, because it belonged to the old patriarch after whom it was named and for the wonderful things which Christ taught on this well curb, to the Samaritan woman. We dismount from our horses in a drizzle, and our dragoman climbing up to the top over the slippery stones, stumbles and frightens us all by nearly falling into it. I measured the well at the top and found it six feet from the edge. Some grass and weeds and fig growths overhang it. In one place the rock is broken through. Large stones embank the wall on all sides. Our dragoman took possession and dropped them in, and from the time they clicked on the bottom you could hear how deep it was, though not as deep as once, for modern day travellers are applying the same test though in the days of Maundrell the well was a hundred and five feet deep, now it is only seventy. So great is the curiosity of the world to know about that well that during the season a Captain of the army descended to this well, at one of the sides so close that he had to put his head over his head in order to get through, then he fainted and lay at the bottom of the well as the dead, until hours of recovery, he came to the surface.

It is not like the wells dug down to a fountain that fill but a reservoir to catch the falling water and to that Christ refers when speaking of the Samaritan woman about a spiritual supply, he said that she would, if asked, give her "living water," that is, water from a flowing spring.

But why did Jacob make a reservoir there when there is plenty of water all around and a dance of springs and fountains and seem no need of that reservoir? Why did Jacob to the vast expense of boring and digging a perhaps two hundred feet deep as first completed, when, by going a little way off he could have water from other fountains at little no expense. Ah, Jacob was wise. He was his own well. Quarrels and wars might be cut off, so the shovels and pick-axes boring instruments were ordered and the work of nearly four thousand years ago was through the solid rock.

When Jacob thus wisely insisted on having his own well he taught us not to be unnecessarily dependent on others. Independence of business character. Independence of religious character. Have your own well of grace, your own well of courage, your own well of divine supply. If you are an invalid you have a right to be dependent thers. But if God has given you good common sense, and two eyes, and two and two hands, and two feet, He equipped for independence of all the universe except

"What a useless expense you are going to,

under in the valley is plenty of water!"
replied Jacob, "that is all true but sup-

"Why, I have five hundred dollars income a year!" says one. Then spend four hundred dollars in living and ten per cent. of it or fifty dollars in benevolence and the other fifty in being to dig your own well. suppose when Jacob began to dig this well whose curb we are now seated this December, it was a dry season then as now and none comes up and says: "Now, Jacob, suppose you get the well fifty feet deep or two hundred feet deep and there should be no water to drink would you not feel silly?" People passing by the road and looking down from Mount Zion or Mount Ebal near by would laugh and say: "That is Jacob's well, a great hole in the rock, illustrating the man's folly." Jacob replied: "There never has been a well in Palestine or any other country, that once thoroughly dug it would not sooner or later filled from the clouds, and there will be no exception." For months after Jacob had completed the well people went out of respect for the deluded old man to keep their hand over their mouth to hide a laugh and the well remained as dry as the bottom of a bottle that has been hanging over the fire for three hours. But one day the sun was drawing water and the wind got round to the east and it began to drizzle and then great drops splashed all over the well-curb and the heavens opened their reservoir and the rainy season poured its floods for six weeks and there came maidens to the well with empty pails and carried them away full and the camels thrust their mouths into the troughs and were satisfied and the water was in the well three feet deep, and fifty feet deep, and two hundred feet deep and all the Bedouins of the neighborhood and all the passers-by realized that Jacob was wise in having his own well. My hearer, it is your part to dig your own well and it is God's part to fill it. You do your part and He will do His part.

More is said about "good luck," but people who are industrious and self-denying almost always have good luck. You can afford to be laughed at because of your application and economy, for when you get your well dug, and filled, it will be your turn to laugh.

Two Famous Mountains.

But look up from this famous well, and see two mountains and the plain between them on which was gathered the largest religious audience that ever assembled on earth, about five hundred thousand people. Mount Gerizim, about eight hundred feet high, on one side, and on the other, Mount Ebal, the former called the Mount of Blessing and the latter called the Mount of Cursing. At Joshua's command six tribes stood on Mount Gerizim and read the blessings for keeping the law, and six tribes stood on Mount Ebal reading the curses for breaking the law, while the five hundred thousand people on the plain cried Amen with an emphasis that must have made the earth tremble. "I do not believe that," says some one, "for those mountain tops are two miles apart, and how could a voice be heard from top to top?" My answer is that while the tops are two miles apart, the bases of the mountains are only half a mile apart, and the tribes stood on the sides of the mountains, and the air is so clear, and the acoustic qualities of this great natural amphitheatre so perfect that voices can be distinctly heard from mountain to mountain as has been demonstrated by travellers fifty times in the last fifty years.

Can you imagine anything more thrilling and sublime and overwhelming than what transpired on those two mountain sides, and in the plain between, when the responsive service went on, and thousands of voices on Mount Gerizim cried, "Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the fields, blessed shall be thy bask-glory, and dominion, and victory to God the Lamb, and there shall arise an Amen like the booming of the heavens mingling with the thunder of the seas.

On and on we ride until now, we have come to Shiloh, a dead city on a hill surrounded by rocks, sheep, goats, olive gardens and vineyards. Here good Eli fell backward and broke his neck, and lay dead at the news from his bad boys Phineas and Hophni; and life is not worth living after one's children have turned out badly, and more fortunate was Eli, instantly expiring under such tidings, than those parents who, their children recreant and profligate, live on.

head in repentance, and at the close of this service go to the telegraph office and put it on the wing of the lightning that you have turned from your evil ways? Before another twenty-four hours have passed, take your feet off the sad hearts at the old homestead. Home to thy God, O prodigal!

Many, many letters do I get in purport, saying: "My son is in your cities; we have not heard from him for some time; we fear something is wrong; hunt him up and say a good word to him; his mother is almost crazy about him; he is a child of many prayers." But how can I hunt him up unless he be in this audience? Where are you, my boy? On the main floor, or on this platform, or in these boxes, or in these great galleries? Where are you? Lift your right hand. I have a

A Message from Home.

Your father is anxious about you, your mother is praying for you. Your God is calling for you. Or will you wait until Eli falls back lifeless, and the heart against which you lay in infancy ceases to beat? What a story to tell in eternity that you killed her? My God! Avert that catastrophe!

But I turn from this Shiloh of Eli's sudden decease under bad news from his boys, and find close by, what is called the "Meadow of the Feast." While this ancient city was in the height of its prosperity, on this "Meadow of the Feast" there was an Annual Ball where the maidens of the city amid clapping cymbals and a blare of trumpets danced in a glee, upon which thousands of spectators gazed. But no dance since the world stood ever broke up in such a strange way as the one the Bible describes. One night while by the light of the lamps and torches these gaities went on, two hundred Benjamites, who had been hidden behind the rocks and among the trees, dashed upon the scene. They came not to injure or destroy, but wishing to set up households of their own, the women of their own land having been slain in battle, and by preconcerted arrangement each one of the two hundred Benjamites seized the one whom he chose prayer and benediction, and breath of orange blossoms and the roll of the wedding march, marriage is solemnized, and with oath recorded in heaven, two immortals start arm in arm on a journey, to last until death do them part. Upon every such marriage altar may there come the blessing of Him "who setteth the solitary in families." Side by side on the path of life! Side by side in their graves! Side by side in heaven!

But we must this afternoon, our last day before reaching Nazareth, pitch our tent on the most famous battlefield of all time—the plain of Esdrael. What must have been the feelings of the Prince of Peace as He crossed it on the way from Jerusalem to Nazareth! Not a flower blooms there but has in its veins the inherited blood of flowers that drank the blood of fallen armies. Hardly a foot of the ground that has not at some time been gullied with war-chariots or trampled with the hoofs of cavalry. It is a plain reaching from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. Upon it look down the mountains of Tabor and Gilboa and Carmel. Through it rages at certain seasons the river Kishon which swept down the armies of Sisera, the battle occurring in November when there is almost always a shower of meteors so that "the stars in their courses" were said to have fought against Sisera. Through this plain drove Jehu, and the iron chariots of the Canaanites, scything at the hubs of the wheels, hewing down their awful swathes of death, thousands in a minute. The Syrian armies, the Turkish armies, the Egyptian armies again and again trampled it. There they career across it, David and Joshua and Godfrey and Richard, Cœur de Lion, and Baldwin and Saladin—a plain not only famous for the past, but famous because the Bible says the great decisive battle of the world will be fought there—the battle of Armageddon.

To me the plain was the more absorbing because of the desperate battles here and in regions around in which the Holy Cross, the very two pieces of wood on which Jesus was supposed to have been crucified was carried as a standard at the head of the Christian host: and that night closing my eyes in my tent on the plain of Esdrael—for there are some things we can see better with eyes shut than open—the scenes of that ancient war come before me. The twelfth century was closing and Saladin at the head of eighty thousand mounted troops was crying, "Ho for Jerusalem! Ho for all Palestine!" and before them everything went down, but not without unparalleled resistance. In one place one hundred and thirty Christians were surrounded by many thousands of Furious Mohammedans.

For one whole day the one hundred and thirty held out against these thousands. Tennyson's "six hundred" when "some one had blundered," were eclipsed by these one hundred and thirty fighting for the Holy Cross. They took hold of the lances which had pierced them with death wounds, and pulling them out of their own breasts and side hurled them back again at the enemy. On went the fight until all but one Christian had fallen and he, mounted on the last horse, wielded his battle axe right and left till his horse fell under the plunge of the javelins and the rider, making the sign of the cross toward the sky, gave up his life on the point of a score of spears. But soon after, the last battle came. History portrays it, poetry chants it, painting colors it, and all ages admire that last struggle to keep in possession

on which Jesus was said to have expired. It was a battle in which mingled the fury of devils and the grandeur of angels. Thousands of dead Christians on this side. Thousands of dead Mohammedans on the other side. The battle was hottest close around the wooden cross upheld by the Bishop of Ptolemais, himself wounded and dying. And when the Bishop of Ptolemais dropped dead, the Bishop of Lydda seized the cross and again lifted it carrying it onward into a wilder and fiercer fight, and in the nineteenth century it is the mightiest symbol of glory and triumph, and more than other standards whether inscribed with eagle, lion, or bear, star, or crescent. That Saladin trampled on the plain of Esdrael to-day for your marshall.

The cross! The foot of it planted in the earth it saves, the top of it pointing to the heavens to which it will take you, the out-spread beam of it like stretched arms of invitation to nations. Kneel at its foot, your eye to its victim. Swear eternal allegiance to its power. And as that mighty symbol of power and triumph is kept before us, we will realize how insignificant are the little crosses we are called to bear and will more cheerfully carry them.

Must Jesus bear the cross alone
And all the world go free?
No, there's a cross for every one
And there's a cross for me.

As I fall asleep to-night on pillow in the tent on the plain of Esdrael reaching from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, the waves of the river Kishon soothing me by a lullaby, I hear the gathering of the hosts for the last battle of the earth. And by their representatives America is here and Europe here and Asia is here and Africa is here and all heaven is here and all hell is here, and Apollyon on black horse leads the armies of darkness, and Jesus on the white horse leads the armies of light, I hear the roll of the drums and clear call of the clarions, and thunder of the cannonades. Then I hear the wild rush as of lions of troops in retreat, and the shout of victory as from fifteen hundred millions throats, then a song as though all the armies of earth and heaven were joined, clapping cymbals beating time—"The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever."

SINGING MOTHERS.

REMEMBER that the song you will be echoed long years hence writes Rev. N. D. Johnson, in the Louis Observer. Though almost fifty years have gone since the voice said, "How tedious and tasteless hours;" and "There is a habitation;" and "How firm a foundation," though many sweet singers have been listened to, there are none that linger in the memory with half the sweetness of that mother's set hum of these old tunes. I think it would make one of the sweetest choirs of the heavenly world if the mothers could get together and sing in that low, tone, some of the sweet songs of praise which they sang here to the little ones. Oh Lord, give singing and praying mothers, and our land shall sword against javelin, and battle-axe upon helmet, and piercing spear against splintering shield. Horses and men tumbled into heterogeneous death. Now the wooden cross on which the armies of Christians had kept their eye, begins to waver, begins to descend. It falls! and the wailing of the Christian host at its disappearance drowns the huzzah of the victorious Moslems. But that standard of the cross only seemed to fall. It rides the sky to-day in triumph. Five hundred million souls, the might-

A Pension has been Granted to a Woman at Port Jervis, N. Y., on the presumption of her husband's death. He had served in a regiment of New York Volunteers in the war, and was honorably discharged at its close. He received his pension down to the year 1875. In September of that year he set out to visit a friend living about a mile away from his home. He was seen going in that direction, but he never reached his friend's house, nor was he seen afterward. After waiting some years, his wife applied for a pension, but her application was rejected, as she could not prove that her husband was dead. Now she has applied again, urging that the fact that he had not drawn his pension for fifteen years was a strong presumption that he was dead. It may be inferred that the Pension Office is of the same opinion, for she was notified last week that her name has been placed on the pension rolls. The same argument, however, would not be sufficient evidence of the death of some Christians. The blessings and graces which God pledges Himself to give to those who claim them are not sought though they are needed and the men still live. (Matt. 7 : 7, 8.)

JESUS RISEN.

S. S. LESSON FOR NOV. 30, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 24 : 1-12 ; GOLDEN TEXT, I. COR. 15 : 20.

The Christ Life a Resurrection from Death—The Death and Resurrection Sides of Christ's Life—The Women at the Cross—Joseph's Unshaken Faith—The Spices and Ointment Prepared—The Anticipated Difficulty of the Stone—The Pertinent Question—The Resurrection Process Begun in Life—The Women's Message Discredited.

"NOW has Christ been raised from the dead the first fruits of them that are asleep," (1. Cor. 15 : 20, R. V.) "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1. John 3 : 8), sin, sickness, sorrow, shame, death. If He was crucified that we also might be crucified with Him, He rose again that we also might "walk in newness of life."

The cross means death to self-life, the resurrection means not only justification, but also the power and presence of the Christ life. If the cross of Christ has not only been for us, for our sins, but also in us crucifying "the flesh, with its affections and lusts" (Gal. 5 : 24), so also the resurrection of Christ is not only for us but also in us, a new life, the Christ life, the very "eternal life which was with the Father." But there can be no resurrection where there has been no death. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." (1. Cor. 15 : 36.) But "if ye, through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Just as death must precede resurrection, so surely resurrection follows death. "That which thou sowest thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain . . . but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him." The Christ Himself was sown on this earth's soil as "a root out of a dry ground" having "no form or comeliness." There was restriction, subjection, a dying to His own will, all through His life. "I have not spoken of myself ; but the Father which sent me, He gave me a commandment, what I shall say, and what I shall speak. And I know that His commandment is life everlasting : whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak." (John 12 : 49, 50.) Nothing could be a more real death and crucifixion to the pride and self-importance of human nature than this absolute dependence upon His Father for every word—this is

The Death Side ;

Where is the resurrection ? "They were astonished at His doctrine, for He taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes." (Mark. 1 : 22.) "And all bare Him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth." (Luke 4 : 22.) "The words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life." (John 6 : 63.) His word quelled the storm, cast out the demons, healed the sick, brought Lazarus from his grave, etc.—no wonder the disciples said of it, "What a word is this, for with authority and power He commandeth the unclean spirits and they come out." (Luke 4 : 36.) This is

The Resurrection Side.

Yet only the first dawn of it, to be consummated, when, as the Word of God, followed by the armies of heaven, He will smite the nations by the sharp sword which goeth out of His mouth.

After Jesus had given up the ghost, commending His Spirit to His Father, and the centurion had borne witness to Him, the multitude dispersed, smiting their breasts, under the impressions of the hour, but understanding nothing of the wondrous transaction which had just taken place. There were interested spectators, also, the women that followed Him from Galilee, but they "stood afar off" with three exceptions, Mary, the mother of Jesus, Mary the wife of Cleopas, and Mary Magdalene. (John 19 : 25.) These had gone deeper with Jesus than the other disciples, and the world and they had nothing in common. But there was one man, Joseph of Arimathea, whose purpose in life was to look for the kingdom of God. He sat silent in the council which condemned Jesus, and even now his faith was not shaken ; he came boldly and asked for the body of Jesus. His request was granted. He took down the lifeless body of our Lord from the cross, "wrapped it in linen, and laid it in" a sepulchre which was hewn in stone, wherein never before man was laid. Alone in His death Jesus must be alone in His burial, too. The women who had followed Him from Galilee truly followed after and beheld the sepulchre, and how His body was laid, but it was only to fall back upon their earthly conceptions and their earthly resources. They returned to busy themselves in preparing spices and ointments to keep the body of the Son of God from corruption !

Mistaken Women !

They did their best, but how little they had understood their Lord ! And we ? As we yield ourselves to our God, our life is one long disappointment on human lines, one death and resurrection on divine lines. All we are and all we have, all we do and all we think, has to pass through death, that the flesh may, like the corn of wheat which falls into the ground, die to its own goodness, and its own power, and that Christ may be formed in us, the Hope of glory. The women rested on the Sabbath, but very early the first day of the week they came to the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared. But early as they were, one had preceded them, who brought nothing in her hand. Mary Magdalene had waited neither for spices nor for the dawning of the day, she "came while it was yet dark unto the sepulchre." Was it she who anointed Him for His burial ? Was she the same with the sister of Martha and Lazarus ? This is not clear ; in any case, Mary had no interest outside Jesus' grave, until He made Himself known to her as the risen One. The women found to their amazement that the stone at the door of the sepulchre was rolled away. They had expected to find a stone between them and a dead Christ, and had said among themselves, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre ?" They entered in, but they found neither the stone nor the dead Christ whose body they had come to anoint. They looked for what they had left two days before, they were

On Human Lines Still.

We have to do with Him who is the First and the Last and the Living One. (Rev. 1 : 17.) If we can trust our Shepherd when He leads us through the valley of the shadow of death in our personal experience, in our work for God, in our family or social relations, we shall find we have no longer to do with a dead Christ but with a living, mighty One to whom all things are possible. It was no longer permitted to these women of Galilee to minister to Jesus as they had done, their spices and ointments, the doing and serving, the busy Martha spirit were all out of place. They were perplexed. God does not leave his true children long in perplexity. He sent heavenly messengers with a heavenly message, "Why seek ye Him that liveth among the dead ? He is not here ; but He is risen : remember how He spoke unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying, The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again." And they remembered His words. Until now, those words of Christ had gone for nothing. Oh, are there not many who live in perplexity and poverty of soul, vainly seeking a dead Christ, to whom they fain would minister ? In the past, His word had come to them in power, but they were not obedient "to the heavenly vision" (Acts 26 : 19), the impression faded away, and for years they have walked afar off, mingling much of self-effort, much of the flesh, with their devotion, because they have not endured as seeing him who is invisible.

Why seek ye Him that liveth among the dead ? In resurrection everything is changed. Thou sowest not that body which shall be. Old experiences are not again to be repeated ; it is the change from corruption to incorruption, from that which can pass away to the power of an endless life, from the evanescence of things temporal to the powers of the age to come, from human to divine. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. O with what intense longings do we look forward to the hour when Jesus shall come again, when we shall not sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, when "a spiritual body shall be a reality with us as with Jesus." His resurrection and the redemption of our body shall be a realized fact. Then shall the Lord have His true victory. But even now He is changing His own. He is conforming Himself to His own image, wooing her from absorption with things of time and sense, endearing with His spirit, making the resurrection reality in her spiritual experience. But there are many yet who seek the living among the dead. They want to revive former feelings of love to God, former consciousness of zeal, love to souls, just where the Spirit of the Lord has blown upon the goodness of the flesh, withered it. Many would revive that goodness, because a risen Christ in them is not understood, and they still expect from themselves what only His life in them quietly received, believed in and acknowledged, will produce. He is not here for He is risen. He is not to be found where nature would still seek Him, He is in "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible," (1. Pet. 3 : 4,) not in senses and feelings but in the spirit life.

The women returned from the sepulchre with their new heaven-taught light upon the way which Jesus had taught them when on earth, which they had so lightly heeded and told the things unto the eleven and to the rest. The Holy Ghost who teaches all things had yet obtained possession of the disciples, in words to them were as idle tales and they believed them not. So unpopular and yet so intensely important is the truth of resurrection.

LILLIAN'S EASTER HAT.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Nov. 30 : "Not Christ risen from the dead and become the first of them that slept." I. Cor. 15 : 20.

BY ALICE M. MUZZY.

"CHRIST is risen! Christ is risen!" the choir of the church were singing where Ell Buckingham worshipped. There were some of the best voices in New York City in choir and the music, one of Mosenthal's melodious Easter Anthems seemed to be filling their souls, both with the harmonies, the exalted sentiment of the words that they carried most of their hearers along with it and into that blest region—mysterious, always longed-for—known as "out of themselves." But, notwithstanding, Lillian usually takes more interest in the music than in other part of the church service, to-day it falls heeded on her ear. She evidently is oppressed with some weight on her conscience for stands thus cast down, perfectly motionless except when she puts her hand to her head to just her hat. And as we follow the motion her hand we cannot help observing what a simply perfect gem in the millinery line her hat is. Light ! why you could not imagine anything lighter, but there seemed to be something oppressive and heavy about that very hat to Lillian. What can be the reason ? Let us enter the young girl's reflection-chamber as she sits listening to (but not hearing) the beautiful Easter Anthem.

She is saying to herself, "Just a year ago I joined the church. I have never regretted one minute, but I wonder if all is right with me. On Sundays it seems so ; for I feel eager, Christ's work and full of joy and enthusiasm. It is the week that makes me doubtful. I am so different on week-days from what I do on Sundays. Why can I not feel this happy devotion in religion when I am at home ? I am afraid it is not right. 'What was it the preacher said now ? 'If Christ be indeed risen in our hearts, our lives will show forth His spirit.' We must live His life, follow His footsteps, do good to whom we come in contact, sacrifice ourselves and desires if by doing it we can make us happier. Other people will see Christ in and be led to seek the same power that is us a blessing." Ah! it is not so with me. I cannot make any one happy and I am afraid I am very selfish."

"At this point the pretty hat slipped on the fair and Lillian's hand went up to replace it. There was a new current to her thoughts.

"Ah, this hat is a case in point! It looks very

"I know it suits me, but it proves my selfishness. It's true Uncle George gave it me, but I did not when I admired it so. 'Well, Lillian, I will give it you if you would like it, but you know I am not rich, and if I give you that hat it will cost me all the money I had laid aside to buy presents for your mother, your sister, and yourself for Easter. What do you say, shall I spend it on the hat?' I never said a word, I only looked on longingly at the hat. But, wicked girl! I knew I was all that was necessary with Uncle George. Of course the hat was soon mine. But I repise myself for getting it that way, and, too, Mamma worked so hard to finish this for me to wear on Easter Sunday; for she I could not wear such a hat as that with those clothes, and now she is sick in bed and is unable to stay at home to take care of her. I ought of course I ought to have done so, because it was working for me that made her ill. If I had thought as much of cultivating a self-like spirit as I did of my vanity I would have told my sister to wear the hat and instead of on her coming in my place. Oh dear! dear!" and as the anthem closed, Lillian, with her head in the closing prayer, weeping freely, but resolving by God's grace not to let her Lord's glorious resurrection be in vain, or as her remaining in a continued state of neglecting to cultivate His Spirit was earned.

The strength of her good resolutions was put to the test. On leaving the church she found the wind blowing in sudden gusts. A particularly strong gale took her beautiful dress as she was just turning the corner, and carried it from her head on to the dusty pavements, flying away at a great rate. A street arab caught he saw in this catastrophe a means of inflicting a malicious instinct for mischief, so he joined in the chase, and being more fleet of foot, captured the hat and placed it on top of a stick, and held it teasingly far above Lillian's reach. Imp that he was! He danced and jested around, enjoying her distress, and holding the hat on the top of the stick till the crowd showed through the crown. There stood an, with rosy cheeks and dishevelled hair, as the wind was tossing about her face, and tears began to run down her cheeks.

"What are you doing, you young rascal?" exclaimed an elderly gentleman, who just then reached the corner and saw what was going on. He took the lady her hat directly," and he emphasized the order with a smart cut, with his cane. "I have a great mind to hand you over to the police. A week or two on the Island would do you good, and I'll do it, too, if the law says the word."

"Lillian had by this time fixed her hat on her head, and she looked appealingly to the old gentleman who stood with his hand grasping the arm of the boy, and punctuating his remarks with vigorous shakes. "Oh no, sir," she said, "you are very kind, and I thank you so much, but don't have the boy arrested; it might ruin him."

"Well, then he shall beg your pardon." He released his grip on the urchin's collar and said, "Now, you ask the lady's pardon for spoiling her hat that way."

"Shan't," said the boy, shaking himself and swinging well out of reach of the cane. "I'd do it in, if I'd the chance."

"There," said the gentleman, "You see kindness is no good with such boys. Why did you let me give him in charge of the police?" "I could not do it, sir. I have been reproaching myself all morning for my selfishness and want of sympathy with others and, resolving to do better in future, I could not begin by sending a miserable little boy to prison."

"Oh you are too kind-hearted; but I never could understand you religious people. You are always forgiving, and such as he take advantage of you. Well I'm glad you are all right again. Good morning."

The old gentleman went on his way and Lillian resumed her walk toward her home. She had not proceeded far before the boy, who had kept safely on the other side of the street till her protector was out of sight, crossed over and addressed her.

"Say, Miss," he said, "You was good to me just now. I'd ha' got a week on the Island for that if you'd let the gentleman call the cop, I'm sorry I did for your hat now."

"I'm glad to hear that," said Lillian, "But you'll get into trouble if you do not behave better. Now run home and get yourself—"

"Haint got no home," returned the boy.

They were only a block or two from Uncle George's, who Lillian knew was looking out for a boy to run errands, and to wait on his office door; so she resolved to take the boy there and see what could be done.

Uncle George was not at all prepossessed in favor of the stranger, but again Lillian looked beseechingly and Uncle George said he would try him.

That was the beginning of a new and useful life for the street arab. It was the first time he had ever had a chance of employment and he made the best of it. Uncle George was delighted with his anxiety to please, his sprightliness and industry, and soon promoted him to a better position. Lillian did not lose sight of him. She persuaded him to go to Sunday School and the boy, remembering her kindness to him at their first meeting, was devoted to her. He had a large acquaintance among street-boys, and at a hint from her, he marshalled a class of a dozen for her to teach.

It was the beginning of a new life for the girl. Some of the boys had parents whom she got to know, and in whose homes there were plenty of opportunities for Christian work. In the school and in her visits to those poor homes the Christ-life grew. Her own spirit was blessed in blessing others, and she was no more tormented by self-questioning or self-reproaches, for she knew that in her, Christ had risen again and in her life His work and spirit were living on.

THE BROKEN SEVENTIETH WEEK

BY WILLIAM KELLY.*

AFTER the saints have been "caught up" to meet the Lord in the air, according to 1. Thessalonians 4., to subsequently appear with Him in glory—the intervening interval will be occupied by momentous events both in heaven and on earth. The course of these events are detailed in the Book of Revelation, from the end of chapter 5., in which the saints are seated around the throne of God, to chapter 19., where they are again seen marshalled as the armies in heaven, and accompanying the Lord Jesus on His march to judgment, as "King of kings and Lord of lords."

Often has the question been raised and discussed: "Shall the Church be on earth, to pass through these scenes of unprecedented tribulation and judgment, or shall it be removed ere then to heaven?" That there will be saints on earth in the midst of it all—suffering and slain, for their testimony is certain, and if they be not the Church, who are they?

In answer to this, we find first, that in Daniel 12 : 1, they are called "the children of thy people." Of those an election, viz., "Everyone that shall be found written in the book" shall be delivered. The whole Book of Daniel treats of the period of Gentile supremacy in the earth, of the time when Israel is captive and oppressed, and its prophecy goes on to "the time of the end"—foretells of Daniel's people, and their deliverance by the coming of the Lord to take vengeance upon their oppressors. The whole period from the cutting off of the Messiah till His coming again to reign is overstepped, so that this present parenthetic dispensation does not at all appear. The saints, therefore, spoken of throughout Daniel, as passing through these events, are not Christian, but Jewish: and as such shall be saved by judgment on their foes, and shall be blessed in the land of Israel. In perfect harmony with this are the words of our Lord in Matthew 24 : 15-31. The whole of this passage treats of a time of trouble in the land of Judæa; there also an elect remnant is seen, who cannot be deceived by Satan's imitations of Christ; for the false Christ cannot deceive those who know the true. This remnant shall be saved in the flesh, and to this end those days "shall be shortened." Such language is inappropriate to the Church—for we being destined for a heavenly and not an earthly inheritance, shall not be saved by sparing us in the flesh, but by death and resurrection, or by a changing of our mortal bodies equivalent thereto.

At no time does God leave Himself without a witness, and in the midst of those days of tribulation and apostasy, He will certainly have His faithful witnesses, but the character of their testimony will not be such as the Church is now called to bear, viz., of grace, but rather analogous to that of Moses and Elias,

A Testimony of Judgment.

Such is the character of the testimony of the two witnesses in Rev. xi. Fire proceeded out of their mouths and devoured their enemies. Again, the fact that an Angel flying in the midst of heaven, proclaims the everlasting Gospel to men (see Rev. 14 : 9, 7), is strongly presumptive evidence that the Holy Spirit in the Church had previously been withdrawn.

Some have maintained, that between the coming of the Lord for His Saints, and His return with them to judgment, there will be no interval, and based this conclusion upon the Second Coming of Christ being ever spoken of as one event. They argue that if there be an interval between, during which Antichrist reigns then there must be "two Second Comings of Christ."

This may appear at first sight conclusive, but a very slight reference to the manner of prophetic scriptures will show that, although plausible, the argument is fallacious. When viewing an extensive landscape, those objects in the foreground, which are a mile or less apart, are seen to be so. Distances are easily estimated by the eye—but in the far distance, mountain peaks that may be many miles apart appear as one or close together. Such is the manner of prophecy. In the old Testament Scriptures the "sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow" are almost invariably foretold, as though the glory would immediately follow the sufferings. No mention is made of stretching out for well-nigh two thousand years between the rejection of Christ and His coming a second time in glory. Indeed, strange as it may seem to some, it is only from the New Testament that we know of any such distinction as a first and second coming of the Lord Jesus. As far as the Old Testament Scriptures are concerned, the two events appear as one. As to the "two first resurrections," this idea arises from not seeing that the "first resurrection" comprises all who rise to life eternal, including Christ as the first-fruits; some who were raised immediately after Him (Matt. 27 : 52, 53), the Church, the Old Testament Saints, the two Witnesses of Rev. 11 : 11, 12, and finally, the entire company of those who shall be slain under Antichrist, for the Word and the testimony which they hold. Then and not till then is the expression used—"This is the first resurrection."

MARRIAGE STILL POPULAR.

SO much has recently been said about marriage as a failure, it is interesting to see that people do not believe a word of it. Recently in high life and common life, the altars have been surrounded by congratulatory groups. It is evident that all the talented things that have been said antagonistic to marriage have made no impression upon this divine institution. Never so many orange wreaths have been twisted—never so many wedding-marches played—never so many high hopes raised—never so many hearty congratulations offered. No one thinks marriage a failure unless he be a scoundrel, or he be chained for a life-time to a vixen, a termagant or a fool. God instituted marriage, and He never instituted a failure. The cases of unhappy conjugal alliance are as few when compared with the happy homes as the case of rheumatism when compared with healthy limbs, as the blind eyes when compared with the good eyes, as the figure one when compared with five thousand. You might as well denounce health as a failure because some people are sick, or honesty as a failure because some people are villainous. Just in proportion as the institution of marriage is honored in any community is that community prospered; and there is no exception. Just in proportion as men have loose ideas in regard to marriage are their lives corrupt.

And what is most beautiful about this heaven-descended institution is that its happiness depends not on worldly successes. Indeed, those are apt most to appreciate their homes who are maltreated of the world, and who fly to them as a refuge. The exquisiteness of the marriage-robe and the length of the white veil trailing through the church aisle are no surer prophecy of a happy life than the plain promise of that one in fustian and the other in calico. What multitudes of men and women have in this relation proved themselves heroes and heroines. Their unfaltering love turned the crust into a banquet, and the one room in a fifth story without an elevator, becomes an Alhambra. They started at the foot of the ladder together. Not dependent upon the whims of the world, which one day may blow from the west and the next day may blow from the east, they were content with their own home. Upon it God came down in blessing, and their lives were hallowed. Though the outside world knew little about them, God knew; and when angel would point out to angel the happy homes of earth, the finger of light would sweep around that dwelling.

Oh, how much a man and woman can stand of trouble if they stand together!—to have some one always at hand to put the best face on everything, and, instead of saying, "I told you so," declare, "It might be worse." "It will be better," and "Who cares anyhow?" I was reading to-day in Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire how, when an insurgent, after suffering all kinds of privation, surrendered to Belisarius, the captive was overcome with laughter at his own plight as he stood in the presence of his conqueror. And there is a way of laughing off many of the hardships of life, and blessed is that man, blessed is that woman, who has at home one who can make light of misfortunes and turn tragedy into comedy. But far better than the power of caricature and a natural disposition to make the best of things is religion dominant in a household. That explains and sanctifies and irradiates as nothing else can. May the divine Spirit sanctify all our homesteads. Mere sentiments of gallantry soon die out. The mounted knight who, in olden time, rode forth to the tournament and, with sword clashing against sword, won his bride, was often characterized by subsequent cruelties which quite equaled his prowess. The eloquence of Cicero was not greater than the meanness with which he cast off his wife, Terentia. Pompey's valor was not more remarkable than the dastardliness with which he turned from her whom he had promised to protect, and the learning of Cato was not more to be honored than his treatment of his wife, Marcia, was to be despised. But it shall be well with those who marry in the Lord. Happy in life. Happy in death. Happy forever. What more beautifully suggestive thing was ever said than that which aged Jacob said: "bury me with my fathers in the cave of Machpelah. There they buried Abraham and Sarah, his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah, his wife, and there I buried Leah."

DELICATE HEALTH.

THERE is a constant sympathy expressed by robust people for those of slight physical constitution. We think the sympathy ought to turn in the opposite direction. It is the delicate people who escape the most fearful disorders, and in three cases out of four, live the longest. These gigantic structures are almost always reckless of health. They say, "nothing hurts me," and so they stand in the draughts and go out into the night air to cool off, and eat crabs at midnight, and doff their flannels in April, and carelessly get their feet wet. But the delicate people are shy of peril. They know that disease has been fishing for them for twenty years, and they keep away from the hook. No trout can be caught if he sees the shadow of the sportsman on the brook. These people whom everybody expects to die, live on most tenaciously.

We know of a young lady who married a very wealthy man of eighty-five years, evidently on the ground that he was very delicate, and with reference to her one-third. But the age invalid is so careful of his health, and the young wife so reckless of hers, that it is now uncertain whether she will inherit his store-house or he inherit her wedding-ring.

Health and longevity depend more upon caution and intelligent management of one's self than upon original physical outfit. Paul's advice to the sheriff is appropriate to people in all occupations: "Do thyself no harm!"

FRATERNAL GREETING.

WE can express our interest in other Christians by a simple nod of the head when we meet them on the street. You say, "There are Christians connected with our Church I cannot speak to, because I have never been introduced." You dare not accost them because of the conventionalities of society. We must come upon a higher platform than that. We must remember that we are sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. We must feel that as it would be a very strange thing for two brothers, born of the same parents and nurtured at the same fireside, to pass each other from time to time on the street without any personal recognition; so, and far more than so, it is outrageous when two men, children of the same Heavenly Father, having been seated at the same Communion table, and baptized in the same Holy Spirit, and on their way to the same home, do not recognize each other, whether according to the ordinary laws of society they have a right to express recognition or not. If you are sure that you are a child of God, and you are sure of the fact that the man you meet on the street is a friend of God, you have a right to give him your brotherly sympathy by a nod of the head. God made the muscle of the neck so pliable, and the bones of the neck so easily adjusted to a bow, that He intends we should recognize those who are our brothers in Christ Jesus. And when you go along the street, let there be a lighting-up of the face and a gleam in the eye and a congeniality in your manner for all those who love Christ. Let it not be an outward and hypocritical demonstration; but from a heart warmed up with love for God and love for His kingdom, bow to every Christian man you meet.

Another way in which we can cultivate Christian sympathy, and demonstrate it, and make it practical, is by a shake of the hand. We do not refer to an unmeaning touch of the hand, to an indefinite sprawling out of the fingers; but we mean one warm, decided, positive grip which seems to say, "Here is my regard—my help, you want it—my sympathy, my brotherhood. If secret societies have their signals—and it is stated that when one of their number gets into any trouble in any distant city, he gives some mysterious signal, and help comes; and our brother in the same Order recognizes another by some peculiar way of placing the fingers—shall not we have some grip by which a child of God who has with him the secret of the Lord shall recognize those who are of the same brotherhood, of the same secret society? For the secret of the Lord belongs only to those who fear Him; and whenever you find a man in the brotherhood, give him the grip.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Wave of Financial Panic Checked by a Sudden Death—The Central American Troubles—More Disclosures by Stanley—Koch's Wonderful Cures—A Week of Disasters Abroad—Canon Farrar's New Departure, Etc.

Wall Street Trembled on the Verge of a panic for a whole day last week. The Governors of the Bank of England had advanced the bank's minimum rate of discount from five to six per cent. unexpectedly, for the purpose of preventing speculators with interest on the Continent and South America from drawing gold from the bank for shipment to those countries, and in order to make the London market stronger. This was the signal for a rising movement in New York which was of the nature of a "silent panic." The London air, together with the fact that the American banks were shown to have lost in a single week $100,000, caused a general decline in securities. Money was exceedingly scarce and loans difficult to get, and for a time it seemed as though one of the strongest and oldest firms must go down under the pressure. The entire list went down from one and one-half to two per cent. A disastrous break seemed inevitable when, without a moment's warning, James Struthers, one of the oldest members of the Stock Exchange, dropped dead on the floor from apoplexy. The Exchange was instantly hushed and a hundred heads were bared in the presence of death. A life was sacrificed in the wild excitement, but it stopped the panic. The associated banks then came to the rescue and by binding firmly together, averted further trouble. The North River bank was compelled temporarily to close its doors.

A New Revolutionary Outbreak has Developed in Central America. The Republic of Honduras convulsed by an uprising against President Bogran. Its first appearance was in Tegucigalpa, the capital. General Sanchez who was commander of the troops in the garrison headed the insurrection. The President, and the soldiers who were faithful to him, fought desperately and, after many were killed and wounded on both sides, succeeded in cutting his way out of the city. He made a stand at Tamara in the hope of gathering sufficient troops from the flying districts to recapture the capital and the government. The cause of the revolution is not stated in the telegrams describing the conflict. It is known, however, that Bogran, like Menendez, the late President of Salvador, is in league with Barrios, the former President of Guatemala, to consolidate all the Republics of Central America under one government. It is probable, therefore, that Bogran's fall like that of Menendez was due to that cause. General Sanchez, the insurgent leader, is a friend of Marco De Soto, the ex-president, who was a firm opponent of consolidation. Fears are entertained that Ezeta, the new President of Salvador, may go to the help of Sanchez, in which case Guatemala may be tempted to take a hand on the other side, and so the whole group of Republics may be involved. Late telegrams report that Bogran has made an attack on Sanchez, and defeated him, and has entered Tegucigalpa in triumph.

Explorer Stanley's Terrible Disclosures Concerning the causes that led to the disaster to the rear column of the Emin Relief expedition, have been the sensation of the week, both here and abroad. Corroborated by the statement of Dr. Bonny, who was one of the physicians of the expedition, and by the realistic affidavit of the interpreter Assad Farran, they have gone far toward refuting the charge made by Walter Barttelot, the brother of the late Major Barttelot, that Stanley had slandered the dead members of the expedition in publishing the statement that the rear-guard was wrecked through the irresolution and misconduct of its officers, and especially through the cruelty and reckless course pursued by Major Barttelot. Stanley and Bonny have revealed a state of affairs that has shocked the Christian world. It is asserted that Barttelot acted insanely, and that his brutalities led to his murder; that Jameson, the second in command, instigated the murder of a slave girl, in order to satisfy himself that the stories of cannibalism in Africa were true, buying the child from the natives, and giving her over to his savage followers to do with as they pleased. The child was bound, slain and eaten, while Jameson drew sketches of the atrocious proceeding. The whole painful story will now be ventilated in the courts in England, and may also be made the subject of an official inquiry by the British Government.

No Life Elixir was Ever more Eagerly Sought after than the mysterious, transparent, yellowish fluid discovered by Professor Koch, and which the scientific men of Europe now seem to believe, is destined to revolutionize the medical treatment of a majority of the ailments to which humanity is heir. Emperor William has made the Professor a gift of two hundred and fifty-thousand dollars, and has besides, decided to endow a national institute for the treatment of consumptives. Dr. Koch still declines to publish the formula of this wonderful medicine so that it can be applied anywhere in the civilized world. Its success is said to be something marvellous, curing in a week or two, the lymph in the mixture enabling the patient to throw off the bacillus germs by the necrotic process and acting as a potent chemical reagent on tuberculosis. Invalids from all over Europe are flocking to Berlin for treatment.

The Cause of Social Reform Among the Lower classes in England has received a decided impetus from the action of Canon Farrar who in a sermon preached in his own church in London, lately, openly declared his unqualified approval of the Salvation Army, as a great and indispensable auxiliary in the religious movement now agitating Great Britain. This unexpected recognition has attracted the widest attention in church circles in England. Canon Farrar's eminence as a preacher and author, his many labors in temperance and missionary work, and his personal experiences in dealing with the social conditions prevalent in the English capital, have already been reviewed fully in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A portrait of the distinguished divine is given in this column.

Disasters have Crowded fast Upon Each others' heels during the week abroad. On November 11th, a special passenger train on the Great Western Railway, England, was wrecked by collision with a freight near Taunton, and ten passengers, who had just arrived by steamer from Cape of Good Hope, were killed, and eight others seriously injured. A signal-man's carelessness caused the disaster. Thirty persons were badly injured by the burning of the Wellington Guards' Barracks, at St. James Park, London on the twelfth. There were five hundred soldiers in the Barracks when the fire broke out, and many brave rescues from death took place. The British torpedo boat Serpent foundered off the coast of Spain during a frightful storm on the night of the 9th. She had been partially disabled by a hurricane and her captain was trying to make the port of Corunna or Vigo, when the Serpent struck a reef, and almost immediately went to the bottom. Of the two hundred and seventy-six souls on board, only three are known to have been saved. The news was received in England, several days after where it excited a sensation, particularly as the Serpent is said to have been notoriously unseaworthy.

A Startling Charge, Affecting the Moral State of the alleged Catholics of Hayti was made by the Right Rev. Bishop Coxe during an address before the Women's Auxiliary of the Board of Foreign Missions in New York City, a few days ago. He declared that two-thirds of the so-called Catholics were "voodooists" or heathen devil-worshippers. For four hundred years the island has been in the hands of the Romish Church, yet the men and women who pack the cathedrals are heathen cannibals and voodooists, who worship their idols within the very walls of the sacred edifices. People high in the offices of state follow the same dreadful rites. Sometime before January 1st, a child is taken and fattened, and about New Year's, it is sacrificed to Voodoo and its flesh eaten by those who want to propitiate the God. One president of the island, in trying to suppress the practice, had eighteen men shot, but he was forced to leave the island shortly afterward.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. F. De Witt Talmage, son of the editor of this journal, delivered an address to young men last Sunday afternoon in Association Hall, New York.

The Rev. C. P. Hard, of Bengal Conference, India, writes to the Missionary Office that there have been over 500 baptisms recently in the Central District.

Major Whittle, the evangelist, will soon commence a series of Gospel meetings in Wooster, O., having been invited to do so by the pastors of the evangelical churches of that city.

The revival in the First Place Methodist Episcopal Church Brooklyn, continues with unabated interest. The "Wesley Evangelists," are laboring nightly with crowds of anxious inquirers after salvation, and are reaping a glorious harvest of souls.

Evangelist Bliss has closed his meetings at Moline, Ill. On the last Sunday of his visit seventy persons were received into the various churches of the town, who ascribed their conversion to God's blessing on the revival services. Some of these were prominent business men.

Mr. E. P. Telford accepted an invitation to address the New York, M. E. Ministers' meeting on Nov. 2. He spoke on "Deep Sea Fishing." His remarks elicited warm thanks from the pastors present. Mr. Telford is being much blessed in his labors in Jersey City, N. J. The church is crowded at every service, and there have been some very remarkable conversions.

The death of the Rev. Henry M. Dexter, D.D., of Boston, Mass., occurred on Thursday last. He was sixty-nine years of age, and had been editor of the Congregationalist since 1851. He was the author of several scholarly works on historical and theological subjects. He was regarded as one of the best authorities in America on Congregational history and principles.

The Third Anniversary of the Berachah Mission in West 32nd Street, New York, was held on November 6. It was a time of thanksgiving, for the past year has been one of unprecedented blessing. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Naylor, who support the Mission and personally labor in it, have been much cheered and encouraged by the success that has attended the work, especially among the sailors in port.

The Baptist Ministers' Conference on the Second Coming of the Lord, and kindred topics, an announcement of which appeared a few weeks ago in these columns, was opened yesterday in the Centennial Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston, Mass., presides. Among the pastors taking part in the proceedings are Rev. George C. Needham, F. L. Chapell, J. D. Herr, S. McBride and A. C. Dixon. The meetings continue until Friday night. There are three sessions each day.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, pastor of the Hebrew Christian Church 17 St. Mark's Place, New York, had the pleasure on Nov. 9, of giving the right hand of fellowship to ten Jews, who, having been converted under his ministry united with his church. Mr. Freshman has since officiated at the marriage of two of his converts. The success of this work among the Jews of New York, is remarkable in view of the difficulties in the way of reaching them, and the social sacrifices which every Jew, who avows himself a Christian has to make.

Contributions to the fund for supplying Colored Ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgement, to the amount of $26.50. They are from: Starview, Pa., $2; Maherville, Kan., $10; Winnipeg, Man., Can., $1; Sandisfield, Mass., 50 cents; Tuscarawas, Ohio, $1; Belvidere, Ill., $1; Warner, Ill., $9; Guinda, Cal., $1; York, Minn., $1. Readers contributing to this fund will be notified by mail of the name and address of the minister who will receive the paper through their donation. Anyone who has the welfare of the colored race at heart can find no better way of helping them at small cost, than placing this journal in the hands of one of their ministers every week for a year.

HE DOES NOT SEE DEATH.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Courteous Answer to an Insult—A Great Truth—I. The Gracious Character—Characteristics of the Man who Will Not See Death—He Keeps Christ's Saying—Trusts His Promises—Obeys His Precepts—II. The Glorious Deliverance—The Face Turned Away—The Influence Lifted—The Sting of Death Removed—The Passage an Unconscious One—III. The Great Quickener.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death."—John 8: 51.

IN the previous part of this chapter, we hear the Jews, with malicious voices, assailing our blessed Lord with this bitter question, "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?" How very quietly the Saviour answered them! He did answer them, because He judged it needful to do so; but He did so with great patience, and with sound argument: "I have not a devil; but I honor my Father." Clear proof this! No man can be said to have a devil who honors God; for the evil spirit from the beginning has been the enemy of all that glorifies the Father. Paul, who had not read this passage—for the Gospel of John was not written then—was nevertheless so filled with his Master's spirit, that he answered after a like manner when Festus said, "Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad." He calmly replied, "I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness." This was of our Saviour's gentle and forcible reply: "I have not a devil; but I honor my Father." Brethren, whenever you are falsely accused, and an evil name is hurled at you, if you must needs reply, "give a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear." Be not heated and hurried; for if so, you will lose strength, and will be apt to err. Let your Lord be your model.

The false charge was the occasion of our Lord's uttering a great truth. On they rush, furious in their rage, but their deadly saying was met by a living saying: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Nothing so baffles the adversaries of the faith as to utter with unshaken confidence the truth of God. I pray that, this morning, we may be put into a gracious frame of mind, and may be so helped to keep Christ's saying, that we may inherit this wondrous promise: "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death."

The Conditions.

I. First, consider the gracious character: "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Observe, that the one conspicuous characteristic of the man who shall never behold death is that he keeps Christ's saying or word. He may have other characteristics, but they are comparatively unimportant in this respect. He may be of a timorous nature; he may often be in distress; but if he keep Christ's saying, he shall never see death. He may have been a great sinner in his early life; but, being converted, and led to keep Christ's saying, he shall never see death. He may be a strong-minded man, who keeps a firm grip of eternal realities, and therefore becomes supremely useful; but none the more for that is this promise true to him: the reason for his safety is the same as in the case of the weak and timorous; he keeps Christ's saying, and therefore he shall never see death. Divest yourselves, therefore, of all inquiries about other matters, and only make inquisition in your own heart upon this one point: do you keep Christ's saying? If you do this, you shall never see death.

Who is this man who keeps Christ's saying? Obviously, he is a man that has close dealing with Christ. He hears what He says; he notes what He says; he clings to what He says. We meet with persons nowadays who talk about faith in God; but they know not the Lord Jesus Christ as the great sacrifice and reconciler. But without a mediator there is no coming to

God. Jesus says, "No man cometh unto the Father, but by me." You cannot trust God, nor love God, nor serve God aright, unless you willingly consent to His appointed way of reconciliation, redemption, justification, and access, which is only through the precious blood of Jesus Christ. In Christ we draw nigh unto God. If you reject the way of salvation through the blood of the Lamb, you cannot be keeping the saying of Christ; for He says, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father."

The Meaning of the Promise.

These people, next, making the Lord Jesus their all in all, revered His word, and therefore kept it: they respected, observed, trusted, and obeyed it. By keeping His saying is meant, first, that they accept His doctrine. Whatever He has laid down as truth is truth to them. A very important matter this: the foundation of our faith is even more important than the superstructure. Unless you ground your faith upon the fact that the Lord hath spoken, your faith lacks that worshipful reverence which God requires. Even if you are correct in your beliefs, you are not correct in your spirit unless your faith is grounded on the authority of God's own Word. We are to be disciples, not critics.

Next, the gracious man trusts Christ's promises. This is a crucial point. Without trust in Jesus we have no spiritual life. Say, my hearer, dost thou rely upon the saying of the Lord Jesus, "He that believeth in me hath everlasting life"? Dost thou believe in the promise of pardon to the man that confesseth and forsaketh his sin—pardon through the precious blood of the great sacrifice? Are the promises of Christ certainties to thee, certainties hall-marked with His sacred "Verily, verily, I say unto you"? Canst thou hang thy soul upon of the Lord's saying? Some of us rest our eternal destiny solely upon the truthfulness of Christ. When we take all His promises together, what a fulness of confidence they create in us!

How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in His excellent Word!

Furthermore, the gracious man obeys His precepts. No man can be said to keep Christ's saying unless he follows it practically in his life. He is not only Teacher, but Lord to us. A true keeper of the Word cultivates that spirit of love which is the very essence of Christ's moral teaching. He endeavors to be meek and merciful. He aims at purity of heart, and peaceableness of spirit. He follows after holiness even at the cost of persecution. Whatsoever he finds that his Lord has ordained he cheerfully performs. He does not kick at the Lord's command, as involving too much self-denial and separation from the world; but he is willing to enter in by the strait gate, and to follow the narrow way, because his Lord commands him. That faith which does not lead to obedience is a dead faith and a false faith. That faith which does not cause us to forsake sin, is no better than the faith of devils, even if it be so good.

So, now you see who the man is that keeps Christ's saying. It is by Christ's saying, or by Christ's Word, that life is implanted in the soul: by the same word the heavenly life is fed, increased, developed, and at length perfected. The power and energy of the Holy Ghost which work through the word are used as the beginning, the sustaining, and the perfecting of the inner life. The life of grace on earth is the blossom of which the life of glory is the fruit. It is the same life all along, from regeneration to resurrection. The life which comes into the soul of the believer, when he begins to keep Christ's sayings, is the same life which he will enjoy before the eternal throne in the realms of the blessed.

II. Now we turn to the delightful subject of The Glorious Deliverance which our Lord here promises: "He shall never see death." Our Lord did not mean that he shall never die, for He died Himself; and His followers in long procession, have descended to the grave. Some brethren are cheered by the belief that they shall live until, the Lord comes and therefore they shall not sleep, but shall only be changed. The hope of our Lord's appearing is a very blessed one, come when He may; but I do not conceive that to be alive at His coming is any great object of desire. Is there any great preference in being changed beyond that of dying? Do we not read that, "We which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep"? This is a great truth. Throughout eternity, if I die I shall be able to say I had actual fellowship with Christ in the article of death, and in descent into the grave, which those happy saints who will survive can never know.

Death or Rapture.

How dear will Christ be to us when, in the ages to come, we shall think of His death, and shall be able to say, "We, too, have died and risen again"! You that are alive and remain will certainly not have a preference over us, who, like our Lord, shall taste of death. I am only speaking now of a matter of no great moment, which, as believers, we may use as a pleasant subject of discourse among ourselves. We grieve not that our brother has fallen asleep before the Lord's glorious appearing, for we are sure that he will be no loser thereby. Our Lord has said, "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death"; and this does not relate to the few who will remain at His second advent, but to the company of those who have kept His saying, even though they pass into the grave.

What does this promise mean? It means this, in the first place: our face is turned away from death. The awakened sinner is made to look at eternal death, which is the threatened punishment of sin. He stands gazing upon the result of sin with terror and dismay. While unforgiven, I cannot help gazing upon it, and foreseeing it as my doom. When the Gospel of the Lord Jesus comes to my soul, and I keep His saying by faith, I am turned completely round. My back is upon death, and

My Face is Towards Life.

Death is removed from us; life is received; and more life is promised. What has become of our death? Our Lord endured it. He died for us. "He his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." In His death as our representative we died. There is no death penalty left for the believer.

Then comes in another sense of the expression. "He that keepeth my saying shall never see death," means that his spiritual death is gone never to return. Alas, you ungodly ones! although you know it not, death is everywhere within you. You are "dead in trespasses and sins." Your sins are to you what grave-clothes are to a corpse; they seem your natural investiture; they cling to you, they bind you. As soon as ever the Gospel saying of the Lord Jesus comes to a man with power, what is the effect? He is dead no longer: he begins to see life. It may be, that at first it is a painful life—a life of deep regrets for the past, and dark fears for the future; a life of hungering and thirsting; a life of pining and panting; a life that wants a something, it scarcely knows what, but it cannot live without it. This man sees life; and the more he keeps his Saviour's word, the more he rejoices in Christ Jesus, the more he rests on His promise, the more he loves Him, the more he serves Him, the more will his new life drive death out of sight.

At the Coming of the Lord.

"But," cries one, "will not a Christian man die?" I answer, not necessarily; for some will remain at the coming of our Lord, and these will not die; there is no legal necessity that any should die, since the obligation would then rest alike on all. But good men die. But death is changed in its nature in the case of a believer in Jesus. Our death is a falling asleep, not a going to execution. It is a departure out of the world unto the Father, not a being driven away in wrath. We quit the militant host of earth for the triumphant armies of heaven by the gate of death; that which was a cavern leading to blackness and darkness forever, has, by the resurrection of our Lord, been de into an open tunnel, which serves as a passage into eternal glory. As a penal infliction upon believers, death was abolished by our Lord; and now it has become a stairway from a grace-life below to the glory-life above.

"If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death," may further mean, he shall not be under the influence of it. He shall not be perpetually thinking of death and dreading its approach, and that which follows after it. I must admit that there are some rough fear of death; but that is because they do not keep their Master's saying as they ought to. The effect of His saying upon us is frequently such that instead of being afraid to die, we come to long to depart. We do not see death looming before us as a coming tempest; we do not gaze upon it as a fascinating horror which makes our faces pale, and casts a lurid gleam on all around. We see not the darkness, for we walk in the light: we fear not the rumbling of the chariot, for we know who rides to us therein. When the believer dies, he does not gaze on death. He walks through the valley of the shadow of death; but he fears no evil, and sees none to fear. Believers are so rejoiced by the presence of their Lord and Master, that they do not observe that they are dying. When they pass from one world into another, it is something like going from England to Scotland; it is all one kingdom, and one sun shines in both lands. Often travellers by railway ask, "When do we pass from England to Scotland?" There is no jerk in the movement of the train; no road boundary: you glide from one into the other, and scarce know

Where the Boundary Lies.

The eternal life that is in every believer glides along from grace to glory without a break. We grow steadily on from the blade to the ear, and from the ear to the full corn; but the black belt divides the stages of growth from one another. We shall know when we arrive; but the passage may be so rapid that we shall not see it. Like Peter, the departing shall scarce be sure that they have passed through the iron gate, which shall open of its own accord; they shall only know that they are free. Of each one of them it may be said, as of Peter, "He wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision." Fear not death; for Jesus says, "He that keepeth my saying shall never see death."

What a glorious word is this! Alas for you who are ungodly! you are made to look on death. It haunts you now; what will it be in the hour of your decease? "What will you do in the swelling of Jordan?" Nothing remains for you but the wages of sin, which is death. The ruin and misery of your souls will be your endless portion. You will be shut in with the finally destroyed, ruined, and wretched ones forever! This is a dreadful looking for of judgment. It ought to startle you. But as for the believer, surely the bitterness of death is past. We have nothing more to do with death as a penalty or a terror, any more than we have to do with spiritual death as the choke-damp of the heart.

III. This brings me to the third point—

The Great Quicken.

Those Jews—what a passion they were in! How unscrupulous their talk! They could not even quote Christ's words correctly. They said, "Thou sayest, if a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death." He did not say so. He said, "Shall never see death." We may be said to taste of death as our Master did; for it is written that "He tasted death for every man." And yet in another sense we shall never taste the wormwood and gall of death, for to us it is swallowed up in victory. Its drop of gall is lost in the bowl of victory. However, the Lord Jesus did not say that we shall never taste of death; neither did He mean that we shall not die, in the common sense of the word. He was using, to the Jews, words in that religious sense in which their own prophets used them.

"The soul that sinneth it shall die," relates to a death which consists of degradation, misery, inability, ruin. Death does not mean annihilation, but something very different. Overthrow and ruin are the death of a soul, just as perfection and joy are its life forever. The separation of the soul from God is the death penalty; and that is death indeed. The Jews refused to understand our Lord; yet they clearly saw that what Jesus claimed tended to glorify Him above Abraham and the prophets. Hidden away in their abusive words, we find a sense which is instructive. It is not the greatness or the goodness of a believer that secures his eternal life; it is being linked by faith to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is greater than Abraham and the prophets. The man keeps Christ's sayings, and that becomes a bond between him and Christ, and he is one with Christ. Because of their Lord, the saints live; and the living of the saints by Him brings to Him glory and honor. His life is seen in every one of His people: like mirrors, they reflect

His Divine Life.

A sweet inference flows from all this, and with that I conclude. The glory of Christ depends upon the not seeing of death by all who keep His saying. If you and I keep His saying, and we see death, then Jesus is not true. If you, believing in Jesus, gaze on death, it will be proved that either He had not the power or the will to make His promise good. If the saint of God, who has won thousands for Jesus, should after all perish, what a failure of covenant engagements there would be! But that failure would be just as great if one of the least of all those who keep our Lord's word should be suffered to perish. Such a loss of honor to our all-glorious Lord is not to be imagined; and hence if one of you who are the least in your Father's house do really trust in Him, though encumbered with infirmities and imperfections, He must keep you from beholding death. His truth, His power, His immutability, His love, are all involved in His faithfulness to His promise to each believer. I want you to take this home with you, and be comforted.

Ay, and if I have some foul transgressor here this morning, the grossest sinner that ever lived, if thou wilt come to Christ, lay hold upon His gracious saying, keep it, and be obedient to it, thou shalt never see death. There is not a soul in hell that can ever say, "I have kept Christ's saying, and I have seen death, for here I am." There never will be one such, or Christ's glory would be tarnished throughout eternity. Keep His saying, and He will keep you from seeing death! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Boy's Appeal to an Infidel.*

ONE day, some seventy-five years ago, a little lad came out of the door-way of a low, unpainted house in Vermont, with a sorrowful, yet determined expression on his face. He trudged along the country road alone for a considerable distance; his countenance growing more and more troubled as he proceeded, till at length overcome, either by fear or distress, he turned and ran home, the tears coursing down his cheeks. After being comforted and encouraged by his mother, he started out again. On he marched to the house of a rather remote neighbor. It was Mr. —, an isolated, rough-mannered man, of whom the country people reported strange things: that he believed in no life apart from this earth, that he had been heard to say that he should come back as one of the birds, squirrels, or cattle, when done with this body; and, worse than all, that the Bible was not true, and that there was no God. Filled with concern by these reports, the little boy had for some days been thinking the matter over; had become oppressed with a sense of responsibility, and determined to visit the atheist. His mother had noticed his seriousness, discovered his plan, and, fearing that he might encounter harshness or profanity, had tried to dissuade him from going, till, finding the idea was a fixed conscientious purpose, she had at length consented, and the child had set out on his errand. At last the two-mile walk along the hilly road was accomplished, and the house was reached. "Mr. —" said the child, "do you believe the Bible?" "No, no more than I believe in that dog's barking." Not daunted by the blunt negative the little missionary commenced trying to convince the unbeliever that there is a God. "Who sent you here to tell me that?" was the angry question. "Nobody sent me," returned the boy, "but I came to tell you that there is a God." He said it as he would have told a blind man that there is a sun; and then turned homeward, his mission accomplished, his mind at rest. That little boy was Nathan Brown who became Adoniram Judson's co-laborer in Burmah.

The Call to Burmah.

When appeals for reinforcements for the Burman mission reached America, Mr. and Mrs. Brown heard as those who are listening for their Master's voice. "What Christian," wrote the former, "can read the appeals from Mr. Judson, and not feel a desire to go and stand for the help of the Lord against the mighty? For one, I cannot think of staying back." He wrote to his parents expressing his desire, and asking their advice. The letter fell like a bolt on the old home in Whitingham. Deacon Brown replied: "We received your letter and read it with many tears and sighs, and much anxiety about your future prosperity. We should be glad to have you spend your days in this country, but if God has designed that you should leave your native land, I hope we shall not be found to fight against Him, nor murmur at His dispensation, but say as Paul's friends said when he was determined to go to Jerusalem: 'When he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying The will of the Lord will be done.'"

A Baptism in Burmah.

It was one of the most affecting scenes I ever witnessed to see this old man, who had come some distance from the wilderness so blind and decrepit that he could not walk without assistance, openly renouncing his idolatry and bowing to the cross of Christ. Mr. Judson in his examination, asked him what he had been doing all his life. He said that he had never worshipped Gautama, except once, but had spent a great deal of time and money worshipping the Nats, or evil spirits, and they had never done him any good. Since he had heard about this new religion, and believed that Christ died to save all mankind from sin, he never had anything make him so happy in all his life.

In the Zayat, or native chapel, Mr. Judson preached every Sunday in the native language, to an audience seated on the floor upon bamboo mats, the men on one side, the women on the other, the preacher himself sitting on a chair during the discourse. You would be much gratified to see this veteran missionary with his band of Burman Christians around him. He appears rather young for a man of his years (forty-five), and enjoys good health, owing in a great measure to his daily habit of walking three or four miles before breakfast. He wears no hat on these occasions, and goes with immense rapidity. His manner of administering baptism is very impressive. The candidate kneels down with the water as high as his chin, when the administrator pronounces the baptismal formula, and, placing his hand upon the head of the candidate, gently bows him beneath the stream.

A Burman Funeral.

Mrs. Brown describes a Burman funeral procession which passed her veranda one day on its way to the neighboring burning-ground. The coffin was decorated with net, tinsel and paper of the most fanciful colors. The top was of an oval form, the whole ten or twelve feet high, placed on a sort of bier made of bamboos, and was borne on the shoulder of some twenty or thirty men. They went dancing, crowding, pushing, and hallooing through the street in the most ridiculous manner, stopping every few minutes, and swinging and whirling the coffin in every direction. A large procession followed, in a little more orderly manner. After the procession followed twenty or thirty priests, all dressed in their yellow cloth; next and last were the friends of the mourners, carrying the meritorious offerings for the priests, consisting of pineapples, plantains, cocoanuts, sugar-cane, etc. They all passed on to the burning ground and seated themselves in the zayats, built for such occasions, while a few of the men cut the wood, piled it, and prepared for the burning of the body. The assembly gathered around, and seated themselves upon the ground. The body was then placed upon the wood and the fire kindled. While it was burning the priests preached to the people and relatives, telling them how great cause they had for rejoicing, since the meritorious deeds of their friend in this life had secured for him a state of exalted blessedness, which he had now entered. When the discourse was finished they all arose, the relatives advanced toward the body, made most boisterous, affected lamentations, sniting upon their breasts and crying, "A-meh, A-meh," (alas, alas) and retired wailing as they went through the street. Two or three remained to watch the body until it was consumed.

THE AUSTRALIAN STRIKES.

(See illustration.)

ALABOR struggle of enormous proportions has been in progress in Australia for several weeks and has thoroughly disorganized all industries. Not only have mechanics and laborers gone on strike but the crews have deserted the ships in the harbors and joined the cause of labor against capital. The three great cities of Melbourne, Sydney and Adelaide have all suffered. In Melbourne the greatest inconvenience was caused by the strike at the gas works, which kept the city in Egyptian darkness for three consecutive nights. In Sydney the wool industry has been paralyzed owing to the drivers of the lorries striking in a body. The employers hired new men in their places, but the strikers drove them from their seats with stones, rotten eggs and other missiles and the harness was taken from the horses and cut to pieces. The employers who are as a rule, sturdy men, mounted the boxes in their places and, protected by soldiers and police, drove their lorries to the quays. At Adelaide the strikers had matters their own way as there was a smaller force of soldiers and police, and employers were not so united or determined.

Late news indicates that the strikers are losing ground owing to the large number of unemployed laborers in the colony who promptly volunteered to fill the vacant places. The condition of labor in Australia seems to differ but little from that here and in the countries of Europe. The capitalist who starts out to make a fortune calculates the amount of outlay necessary for merchandise and labor, and he looks at both from the same standpoint. He tries to get both at the least cost possible, and cares for the one as little as the other. The Australian workman has made the demand for the eight hour limit for the day but has apparently been defeated by the men who have a common interest with him but whom hard necessity has driven into the camp of the oppressor. A very serious difficulty has resulted. In Sydney alone thirteen thousand men are idle and hungry and the other cities have a similar showing. What they may do in their desperation none can tell. Our illustration represents the large meeting of the strikers in Flinder's Park, Melbourne.

IT is difficult to realize, familiar as we now are with the name of the Congo and of the great lakes of Equatorial Africa, that it is only within our own times that they were discovered. Speke, Grant, Livingstone, Stanley, Captain Burton, Sir Samuel Baker, Schweinfurth and Junker, who have given us our knowledge of the Dark Continent, are men of our own time. It is a remarkable fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy that in the last times "many would run to and fro, and knowledge would be increased."

As Mr. Stanley has already commenced his lecture tour in this country, and many of our readers will have the pleasure of hearing his thrilling story of his travels and adventures the accompanying picture of a scene on the Congo River, and of a fetich-boy from that region, will be of interest. It is gratifying to know that all our Missionary Societies are earnestly endeavoring to spread in that wonderful land the knowledge of the Gospel and to give to its benighted inhabitants the light of life.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

LIFE at Settleworth, and especially around the carpenter's abode, had been running smoothly and in a fairly level channel for some length of time. Nora Mansford grew in favor with all who came into social contact with her, and she herself, thanks largely to Widow Appleton's good influence quietly exerted, prudently maintained, and prayerfully guided, was more and more worthy of the favor into which she grew.

George Appleton still pursued the even tenor of his way, with his usual quietude of temper, honesty of purpose, and now, it must be said, with his silent worship at a distance of Nora, and his low, over-low depreciation of himself. His daily tasks were well and truly done, for George was very opposite of that contemptible workman, whose "eye-service" renders him unworthy of the name; and when his daily tasks were over, his garden and his books, and his mother's company engrossed his leisure, and made his whole manhood the better for the change.

Abram Hardale, was Abram Hardale still, yet with a difference. He was still morose, cynical, sarcastic, on occasion, but willy-nilly, he was under the influence of "petticoats," and his niece could bring the smile across his hard features, and the light into his cold, grey eye in such a fashion, and so often that honest, plain-spoken Tabitha Crowle was led to hazard the prediction that there was hope for him yet. "I used to think that if t' maister's temper ever did come to be any different, it would alter like sour milk at midsummer, all for the worse. But Miss Nora's gotten that about her, that fetches him whether he will or no. When she comes near 'im he seems to catch a whiff o' something sweeter than bean-blossom, an' he softens like a cake o' bees-wax in a warm 'and." Yes, and Tabitha softened too. Most likely any influonce that Nora had upon her crusty relative made him at times a little less "worritting," so that Tabitha felt less called upon to give him "the rough side of her tongue;" still, I think that her tongue itself on that particular side was growing a little less harsh, or, at any rate, that the other and smoother side was kept in more constant use. Nora had been told by Widow Appleton that she had a mission—a field of moral labor, and she was evidently discovering the truth of it, and sowing in the good seed of kindness, and the rain she prayed for came to woo it into light, and the sunshine which had come to her was warm all about her, and Settleworth, at any rate that portion of it subject to her beams, had more of a summer in it than of yore.

There was, however, a small cloud on the Settleworth horizon, not exactly as little as a man's hand, but as little as a man, and that man Gerald Towneley, Esq., which is, perhaps, the synonym of something very small indeed. Doubtless that gentleman himself would entertain a totally different opinion on the question of its magnitude, but then he would object altogether to being called a cloud at all, so we need not trouble as to his view of the case.

Mr. Gerald Towneley, that spruce young scion of a wealthy house, had not succeeded in obtaining much information, either from George Appleton or his master, concerning the young lady who appeared like a fair vision before him on his visit to the carpenter's shop. He was not content with such meagre information as they had given him. He was greatly struck with the beauty of Nora, and as he had a great deal of time hanging heavy on his hands, all there was indeed, and nothing, to his thinking, worth the while to draw his attention elsewhere, he was bent on making the acquaintance of the new comer, and never doubted—how could he, you know?—that he should soon ingratiate himself into her favor, and find her glad and honored to have won the admiration of so superb a swain. He had come to the conclusion that she was a "superior article," and in those very words had given forth that opinion to sundry of his aristocratic chums, who were good enough to prophesy that "Trickie," as they called him in his absence, would add another "conquest" to the list of his past achievements in the war against youth and innocence.

"A superior article." That form of speech may sufficiently define the kind of interest which Mr. Gerald Towneley has felt in Nora, and the object that prompted him to covet her acquaintance. Gerald Towneleys, alas, who regard the gentler sex simply as an "article," ordinary, inferior, passable, superior, and the rest of it, are sadly too numerous on this poor planet, all the poorer for their presence on it, and a compulsory ejection into space would rid the world of one of the most grievous curses this burdened earth contains.

Now, Gerald Towneley, well versed in the bad art of making raids on "superior articles," felt the necessity of securing a go-between so as to establish a line of communication; and he at once decided that the carpenter's house-keeper, Tabitha Crowle, was the ally to be secured. Of course, he never doubted that she was to be won over to his side. She was herself a comparatively young, well-looking, and buxom body, and it might be worth the while to pay attention to her as a mode of reaching the prize behind her. If this was not found advisable, he did not say impossible, the very idea was absurd, then it must be by money, of which he had much too great plenty to be good for him. Money was a golden key that could unlock the heart, and hire the tongue of fifty Tabithas or, for that matter, full fifty more. O the pity of it, that it is true, sadly true, that money in the hands of men as vile as Gerald Towneley, can make even woman "the enemy of her sex." Whether this was true of Tabitha Crowle remains to be seen.

It was the merry month of May—an "old-fashioned" May—in which the chill retarding east wind had not been permitted to kill the genial warmth, or "blast the early promise of the spring." The hawthorne blossom flung its scent upon the warm south wind, and earned the title which the poet has given to it—"the sweet, white blossom of the fragrant May." The claisies and the buttercups, and all the rest of the fair flowers of the field, were gleaming like gems in their emerald setting, and the birds were hymning their vespers in the mellow light of eventide. Honest Tabitha Crowle had been to Settleworth Mill, which stood on an elevated spot a mile and a half or so from the town, and whose broad sails could be descried full many a mile away.

Tabitha had fallen short of meal, and lest the "young things," as she always called the calves, porkers, ducklings, goslings, etc., that tenanted the carpenter's paddock, and were her peculiar care, should

"suffer," she had gone herself to the mill to order new supplies, and had had a pleasant and enjoyable walk. Sauntering leisurely homeward along the green and shady lane, she paused a moment to break off a sprig of hawthorn peculiarly flush with bloom, with a view to pin it on her bosom, for when Tabitha was "tidied up" she was rather "dressy" than otherwise, and had, moreover, a knack, not too common, of putting on a simple finishing touch or two that made her look "real nice," as Nora had often told her. The branch was just a little tough, and hung about as high as she could well reach: and she was getting a little red in the face with her exertions, when, lo, according to the fitness of things, "a brave knight came to her relief."

"Here, let me get it for you miss," said a pleasant voice. Looking round, Tabitha saw a young gentleman, "handsome enough for a picture," she afterwards declared, who was pulling off his glove and smiling pleasantly the while. Just then the branch of hawthorn received another smart tug, that fairly sundered it, and Tabitha scarcely prepared for the sudden victory, fell back into the arms of the unknown knight, and her prize fell to the ground.

Tabitha looked bonnie, and was bonnie, with that superadded bonniness which an honest and pure-minded woman always wears. Probably Gerald Towneley was not used to having a "superior article" with that fair stamp on it so invitingly at hand, and so like the very unparfit and ungenteel knight he was, he clasped her in his arms and kissed her. In another moment he wished he hadn't.

Tabitha's mode of warfare was peculiar. She burst the unrelaxing fetters like tow, and spreading wide those serviceable arms she brought her open hands together. Well, no, not together for Gerald Towneley's head remained between them. There was no need for him, having been smitten on the one cheek to turn to her the other, for they were treated with the broadest impartiality, and the same moment saw them "graced with purple newly dight."

"You himpident hanimal!" said Tabitha, widening her arms for a second compound salutation. But Gerald Towneley had had sufficient; besides he had lost his presence of mind, and his hat; the latter had been shot off by the gust daisies and the buttercups, and all the rest of the fair flowers of the field, were gleaming like gems in their emerald setting, and the birds were hymning their vespers in the mellow light of eventide. Honest Tabitha Crowle had been to Settleworth Mill, which stood on an elevated spot a mile and a half or so from the town, and whose broad sails could be descried full many a mile away.

Tabitha had fallen short of meal, and lest the "young things," as she always called the calves, porkers, ducklings, goslings, etc., that tenanted the carpenter's paddock, and were her peculiar care, should

"suffer," she had gone herself to the mill to order new supplies, and had had a pleasant and enjoyable walk. Sauntering leisurely homeward along the green and shady lane, she paused a moment to break off a sprig of hawthorn peculiarly flush with bloom, with a view to pin it on her bosom, for when Tabitha was "tidied up" she was rather "dressy" than otherwise, and had, moreover, a knack, not too common, of putting on a simple finishing touch or two that made her look "real nice," as Nora had often told her. The branch was just a little tough, and hung about as high as she could well reach: and she was getting a little red in the face with her exertions, when, lo, according to the fitness of things, "a brave knight came to her relief."

"Here, let me get it for you miss," said a pleasant voice. Looking round, Tabitha saw a young gentleman, "handsome enough for a picture," she afterwards declared, who was pulling off his glove and smiling pleasantly the while. Just then the branch of hawthorn received another smart tug, that fairly sundered it, and Tabitha scarcely prepared for the sudden victory, fell back into the arms of the unknown knight, and her prize fell to the ground.

Tabitha looked bonnie, and was bonnie, with that superadded bonniness which an honest and pure-minded woman always wears. Probably Gerald Towneley was not used to having a "superior article" with that fair stamp on it so invitingly at hand, and so like the very unparfit and ungenteel knight he was, he clasped her in his arms and kissed her. In another moment he wished he hadn't.

Tabitha's mode of warfare was peculiar. She burst the unrelaxing fetters like tow, and spreading wide those serviceable arms she brought her open hands together. Well, no, not together for Gerald Towneley's head remained between them. There was no need for him, having been smitten on the one cheek to turn to her the other, for they were treated with the broadest impartiality, and the same moment saw them "graced with purple newly dight."

"You himpident hanimal!" said Tabitha, widening her arms for a second compound salutation. But Gerald Towneley had had sufficient; besides he had lost his presence of mind, and his hat; the latter had been shot off by the gust consequent on the concussion; he picked it up and retired to ponder on the failure of his first attempt to provide a go-between.

Tabitha Crowle picked up the sprig of hawthorn, coolly pinned it on the bosom of her dress, briefly put herself to rights, and made her way homewards with a smile upon her face which said as plain as could be, "Full justice has been done."

The brief delay consequent upon this somewhat stirring episode had enabled the miller, who was coming to town, to overtake Tabitha. "Hello!" said miller Baskin, who was an old and familiar friend; they had been children together in the Settleworth parish school. "Hello! Tabby, why I thought you would have been home long before this. You must ha' been courtin'. Hev yo' seen your young man?"

"Why, yes," said she, laughing aloud. "There must ha' been something o' that sort. He gave me a smack, an' I gave him two; the ugly scamp." The last words were spoken in an impassioned style which showed that she would have been perfectly willing to make the two twosome.

Miller Baskin began to understand. "Why, you don't mean to say you've had a bout wi' young Towneley," said he. "I passed him a few minutes since, an' both his cheeks were as red as the wattles o' my old turkey-cock. He kept puttin' his palm first agin one an' then t'other—tenderly like, i' this way."

Here the worthy miller suited the action to the word, and nursed his cheek as people do when they are suffering from neuralgia. Tabitha was mightily amused. She indulged herself in a fit of laughter, and then told the miller of the whole affair. "When he heard of the way in which Gerald Towneley had been rewarded for the honor he had done her, he stood aghast. If it had been Tom Noakes or Jonathan Giles who had incurred so forcible a fine, why there would be nothing to be said except that it would have served them right; but the son of Squire Towneley, the lord-lieutenant of the county, owner of half the country side, chairman of quarter sessions, and goodness knows what else—for his son, Gerald Towneley, Esq., to be subjected to such an indignity! Miller Baskin was quite distressed as to the possible consequences of such unheard of audacity."

"Why, Tabby!" said Baskin, in surprise. "However durst yo' do sitch a thing to a gentleman like that! It's to be hoped that Squire Towneley won't get to know. He's Abram Hardale's landlord, isn't he?"

"Gentleman, eh?" said Tabitha, "gentle is as gentle does, I say, an' it doesn't matter a pin whether he wears kid gloves or hedging mittens; whether he's the owner of a penny or a parish. I thowt you had more sense. You don't call yourself a miller because your clo'es are covered wi' flour, do yo'? Then, don't you call anybody a gentleman because his isn't."

When Tabitha reached home, she was "a goodish bit flustered," as she confessed to Nora, when she related to her the experiences of the evening, "not so much," she declared, "wi' the tussle wi' my lord, as wi' that gowk of a miller. His face went as white as his jacket when I told him what I'd done; an' its my opinion that he's just as white in his in'ards pretty well all the time, especially when a 'gentleman' comes nigh him."

Having delivered herself of this unusually strong opinion, Tabitha would have been content, perhaps, to lapse into silence on the subject, but that just then Abram Hardale drifted into the kitchen and caught enough to make him curious for more. Of course he would not ask any question, or let it be seen that he cared at all about the matter. That was not Abram Hardale's way. The old oddity knew that he could draw off any amount of information from Tabitha by just turning on the tap in the shape of the expression of a doubt, or of a contrary opinion, or, even by a little dry laugh that included both.

"Tabby Crowle," said he, with well affected surprise, "is that the way you speak of your betters?"

"Better, indeed!" said Tabitha. "What in, I should like to know? Is it because they've most money! Better, indeed! 'A man's a man for a' that'; an' one man's as good as another if he is a man."

"Right you are, Tabitha Crowle. Them's my sentiments," said Abram, effusively, slowly and drily tapering off with the Irishman's confirmation—"and a great deal better. That's where your 'betters' get the advantage, Tabby. Don't you see!"

"No, I don't see; an' I won't see, an' you may call me nothin' but a beetle-bat for not seein'," said downright Tabitha, a little bit confused by this peculiar kind of reasoning—"and there's an end on't, you may depend on't there!" This last half-sentence was Tabitha's formula of finality. It meant that the subject was dismissed. Abram Hardale knew it; Nora Mansford knew it; I am not sure the "young things" did not know it, too.

"I see Hazelcroft is going to change hands again," said Abram Hardale shortly after to his foreman, who was busy at a cart wheel, rimming it, as the process of putting new fellos on it is called.

"Indeed," said George Appleton, with considerable show of interest, "Why, Mr. Willoughby hasn't had it long, and there isn't a nicer spot within a hundred miles of it. He had it a bargain too, if all accounts be true. Nobody seems to care to hold it long. What can be the reason, I wonder?"

"Why, I've a notion," said Hardale, "that there's a bit of mystification about the title to it. If everybody had their rights, which they haven't, and aren't likely to have, Nora Mansford ought to be mistress there, according to my thinking. Her scamp of a father let it go to the dogs to pay gambling debts, though, indeed, the death of his elder brother, Richard, was never proved, and I know that old Squire Mansford left it to him. However, it's quite as hard, and harder, I should think, to prove him alive; and as possession is nine points of the law, one thinks that them that buys it, and holds it, wouldn't be very willing to let it go at less than a fancy price. However, it's changed hands again, and I've got to go and see Squire Towneley the new owner about some alterations that he means to make—pretty considerable, I imagine."

"Why, it's an ill-wind that blows nobody any good," said George Appleton, laughing, "and as trade is certainly rather slack just now, it is to be hoped the Squire will be free with his money."

"If he has any," quoth Abram, who was nothing if not sarcastic. "Squire Towneley seems to me to ha' gotten a bad attack of land-hunger, and he's been buying pretty fast lately. It's just likely he may be getting land poor, and have more on his hands than he can pay for. If it was Nora's, now, as it ought to be—"

"If what was Nora's? What ought to be Nora's, Uncle Abram" inquired that young lady herself, looking as fresh as a rose, as she brought to her relative a somewhat imposing letter.

Postal arrangements at Settleworth were not remarkably prompt or perfect, and although it was getting fast on to midday, the postman's knock had only just been heard at Abram Hardale's door. Nora was clad in a pretty-patterned and neatly-made calico dress, with her profusion of black hair coiled not too neatly, but quite too piquantly for George's equilibrium, above the white collar round her neck. It was quite an important missive which she now placed in her uncle's hand.

A QUAIN OLD LEGEND.
LEGEND in the Talmud is as follows: When Noah was planting his vineyard evil came to him and said, 'What are doing here, Noah?' 'Planting a vine,' says Noah. 'What is the use of a vine?' says the devil. 'It's fruit,' says Noah. 'Whether fresh or dry, is sweet and its wine gladdens the heart.' 'Let us work it on shares,' said the devil. 'No,' said Noah. 'Now what does the do?' He brings a lamb, a lion, a key, and a hog, sacrifices them on the vine and then mingles their blood with the wine. 'What is this for?' cried Noah. Said the devil, 'These are the four stages a vineyard will have to pass through; by doing a little he becomes as simple as a child, allowing everybody to shear him; a little more, he imagines himself a lion, none so violent as he; a little more, he becomes a monkey, jumping and dancing, and imitating all foolishness; a little more, he is led into a sow, that walloweth in the mud, forfeiting the good both of this world and of that which is to come.' "

THE MONEY HELD HIM PRISONER.
SOME time ago," writes a mission worker, "a little boy who had been amusing himself upon a hole in some wood-work; thrust his hand in, and, to his surprise and delight, he found in it a piece of money, which had been put there on purpose to teach the boy a lesson. It was a large coin, and the boy, closing his hand over his find, tried to withdraw it, but the hole was too small. In vain he turned and twisted, his shut hand would not pass through the hole. His father, who had been watching his antics, asked: 'Why is it that you cannot get your hand out of the wood?' 'Father, I have some money in it, and cannot get it out.' 'Let the money fall, let out your hand, and try to draw it through the hole.' The boy dropped the coin, and, following his father's directions, had no difficulty in withdrawing his hand. The father proceeded to tell him that the money, when he would withdraw from the hole unto God, often finds he is not able. Nothing hinders him—a something which must yield before he can accept Christ."

ONLY CHRIST.

Only Christ can save your soul;
Only He can calm your breast;
Only Christ can make you whole;
Only He can give you rest.
When the world and friends forsake,
When your sins oppress you sore,
When the storms around you break,
Who can hope and peace restore?
Only Christ! Only Christ!
He can hope and peace restore!

Only Christ your steps can aid,
Only He can cleanse from sin;
Only Christ, whose blood was paid
As the price your soul to win!
Would you find the Friend of friends?
Would your feet in gladness stray?
Would you know the love He sends?
Would you seek the Light? the Way?
Only Christ! Only Christ!
He alone the Light—the Way!

Only Christ the Saviour true,
Only He who calleth now;
Only Christ who died for you,
With the thorns upon His brow;
He can lead you to that home,
To the loved and ransomed given;
He can keep while here you roam,
He can lead from earth to heaven.
Only Christ! Only Christ!
He alone can lead to heaven!

THE SCENE OF JESUS' EARLY MANHOOD.
ABOUT sixty miles north of Jerusalem the traveller ascends by a steep and rugged path, one of the southern ridges of the Lebanon range of mountains. As the road winds onward and upward he suddenly comes upon a small sequestered hollow, nestling in which, is the town of Nazareth. It is still called en-Nazirah, and its identity with the ancient Nazareth is clearly established.

The town is completely cut off from the surrounding country by the encircling hills, the sides of which are covered with fig-trees and wild shrubs, while their tops of glittering limestone rise to a height of from 400 to 500 feet. It was a despised district, and of all its towns, Nazareth seems to have been most despised. Nathaniel asked incredulously, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" and it was as a mark of contempt that Jesus was spoken of as a Nazarene. It is a comparatively modern town that the traveller now sees there. The houses are of limestone and well built.

Nazareth is rich in associations. There the Virgin Mary was living when the angel visited her with his message from God. Thence she set out with Joseph, her husband, for Bethlehem at the census, that they might be counted among the descendants of David at the place of his birth. Thither they returned after Jesus was born. Thence they fled to Egypt to escape the murderous designs of Herod, and to Nazareth they went back to live when death had removed the tyrant. There Jesus spent the years of His youth and early manhood, about which the Gospels are silent. It was there, too, that the terrible outbreak of mob violence occurred in which He came near losing His life. The traveller can still see in imagination the crowd rushing out of their place of worship, dragging the Divine Teacher who had been preaching to them, hurrying Him up the hill-side that they might cast Him down headlong. It is only necessary now to look at those dizzy precipices, to realize the murderous malignity of those people and appreciate the hatred which the words of the Saviour had so stirred. "He went unto His own and His own received Him not."

"He came to Nazareth, where he was brought up." Luke 4: 16.

WHAT a splendid sleep I had last night in a Catholic convent, my first sleep within doors since leaving Jerusalem, and all of us as kindly treated as though we had been the Pope and his college of cardinals passing that way. Last evening, the genial Sisterhood of the convent ordered a hundred bright-eyed Arab children brought out to sing for me, and it was glorious! This morning I come out on the steps of the Convent and look upon the most beautiful village of all Palestine, its houses of white limestone. Guess its name! Nazareth, historical Nazareth, one of the trinity of places that all Christian travelers must see or that they have seen. Bethlehem, Jerusalem, Nazareth. Babyhood, boyhood, manhood of Him for whom I believe there are fifty million people who would now, if it were required, march out and die, whether under axe, or down in the floods, or straight through the fire.

Grand old village is Nazareth, even putting aside its sacred associations. First of all, it is clean; and that can be said of few of the Oriental villages. Its neighboring town of Nablous is the filthiest town I ever saw although its chief industry is the manufacture of soap. They export all of it. Nazareth was perhaps unusually clean the morning I speak of, for, as we rode into the village the afternoon before, the showers which had put our mackintoshes to the test had poured floods through all the alleys under command of the clouds, those thorough street commissioners. Beside that, Nazareth has been the scene of battles passing it from the Israelite to Mohammedan and from Mohammedan to Christian, the most wonderful of the battles being that in which twenty-five thousand Turks were beaten by twenty-one hundred French, Napoleon Bonaparte commanding. That greatest of Frenchmen walking these very Streets Through Which Jesus Walked for nearly thirty years, the morals of the two, the antipodes, the snows of Russia and the plagues of Egypt appropriately following the one, the doxologies of earth and the hallelujahs of heaven appropriately following the other. And then this town is so beautifully situated in a great green bowl, the sides of the bowl, the surrounding fifteen hills. The God of nature who is the God of the Bible evidently scooped out this valley for privacy and separation from all the world during three most important decades, the thirty years of Christ's boyhood and youth, for of the thirty-three years of Christ's stay on earth, he spent thirty of them in this town in getting ready—a startling rebuke to those who have no patience with the long years of preparation necessary when they enter on any special mission for the Church or the world. The trouble is with most young men that they want to launch their ship from the dry-dock before it is ready, and hence so many sink in the first cyclone. Stay in the store as a subordinate until you are thoroughly equipped. Be a good employee in your trade until you are qualified to be an employer. Be content with Nazareth until you are ready for the buffeting of Jerusalem. You may get so gloriously equipped in the thirty years, that you can do more in three years than most men can accomplish in a prolonged lifetime. These little suggestions I am apt to put into my sermon, hoping to help people for this world, while I am chiefly anxious to have them prepare for the next world.

The Well of Nazareth.

All Christ's boyhood was spent in this village and its surroundings. There is the very well called "The Fountain of the Virgin," to which by his mother's side he trotted along holding her hand. No doubt about it; it is the only well in the village, and it has been the only well for three thousand years. This morning we visit it, and the mothers have their children with them now as then. The work of drawing water in all ages in those countries has been women's work. Scores of them are waiting for their turn at it, three great and everlasting springs rolling out into that well their barrels, their hogsheads of water in floods gloriously abundant. The well is surrounded by olive groves and wide spaces in which people talk and children, wearing charms on their heads as protection against the "evil eye," are playing, and women with their strings of coin on either side of their face, and in skirts of blue, and scarlet, and white, and green, move on with water-jars on their heads. Mary, I suppose, almost always took Jesus the boy with her, for she had no one she could leave Him with, being in humble circumstances and having no attendants. I do not believe there was one of the surrounding fifteen hills that the boy Christ did not range from bottom to top, or one cavern in their sides He did not explore, nor one species of bird flying across the tops that He could not call by name, or one of all the species of fauna on those steeps that He had not recognized.

You see it all through His sermons. If a man becomes a public speaker, in his orations or discourses you discover

His Early Whereabouts.

What a boy sees between seven and seventeen, always sticks to him. When the Apostle Peter preaches, you see the fishing nets with which he had from his earliest days been familiar. And when Amos delivers his prophecy you hear in it the bleating of the herds which he had in boyhood attended. And in our Lord's sermons and conversations you see all the phases of village life, and the mountainous life surrounding it. They raised their own chickens in Nazareth, and in after time He cries: "O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! how often would I have gathered thee as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings!" He had seen his mother open the family wardrobe at the close of summer and the moth millers flying out, having destroyed the garments, and in after years He says: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth where moth doth corrupt." In childhood He had seen a mile of flowers, white as the snow, or red as the flame, or blue as the sea, or green as the tree-tops, and no wonder in His manhood sermon He said, "Consider the lilies." While one day on a high point where now stands the tomb of Neby Ismail, he had seen winging past Him so near as almost to flurry His hair, a partridge, and the hoopoe, and the thrush, and the osprey, and the crane, and the raven, and wonder afterward in His manhood sermon He said, "Behold the fowls of the air." In Nazareth and on the road to it there are a great many camels. I see them now in memory making their slow way up the zig-zag road from the plain of Esdraelon to Nazareth. Familiar with Christ with their appearance, also with the small insect the gnat which He had seen in another strain out from a cup of water or pail of milk, and no wonder He brings afterward the large quadruped, and the small insect in His sermon and, while seeing the Pharisees careful about small sins, and reckless about large ones, cries: "Woe unto you blind guides which strain out a gnat and swallow a camel."

Country Illustrations.

He had in boyhood seen the shepherd get their flocks mixed up, and to one not familiar with the habits of shepherds and their flocks, hopelessly mixed up. And a sheep-stealer appears on the scene and dishonestly demands some of those sheep when he owns not one of the flock. "Well," say the two honest shepherds, "we will soon settle that matter," and the shepherd goes out in one direction and the other shepherd goes out in the other direction, and the sheep-stealer goes in another direction, and each one calls, and the flocks of each of the honest shepherds rush to their owner, while the sheep-stealer calls, and calls again, but gets not one of the flock. No wonder that Christ yet after, preaching on a great occasion and illustrating his own shepherd qualities, says: "Who putteth forth His own sheep He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him for they know His voice, and the stranger they will not follow for they know not the voice of the stranger." The sides of these hills are terraced for grapes. The boy Christ had often stood with great round eyes watching the trimming of the grape-vines. Clip, goes the knife, and falls a branch. The child Christ says to the farmer, "What do you do that for?" "Oh," says the farmer, "that is a dead branch and doing nothing and is only in the way, so I cut it off." Then the farmer with his sharp knife prunes from a living branch this and that tendrill and the other tendrill. "But," says the child Christ, "these twigs that you cut off are not dead; what do you do that for?" "Oh," says the farmer, "we prune off these that the main branch may have more of the sap and be more fruitful." No wonder in after years Christ said in His sermon: "I am the true vine and my Father is the husbandman: every branch in me that beareth not fruit He taketh away, and every branch that beareth fruit I purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. Capital! No one who had not been a country boy would have said that.

Streaks of nature all through Christ's sermons and conversations! When a pigeon descended upon Christ's head at His baptism in the Jordan it was not the first pigeon He had seen. Then He has such wide sweep of discourse you may imagine from one who has stood on the hills that overlook Nazareth. As far as I understand, Christ visited the Mediterranean Sea only once, but any clear morning He could run up on a hill near Nazareth and look off to the west and see the Mediterranean, while to the north is snowy Mount Lebanon, clad in white robe of ascension, and yonder on the east and southeast Mount Gilboa, Mount Tabor.

THE CHILDREN'S CONCERT.

THE FOUNTAIN OF THE VIRGIN.

Mount Gilead, and yonder in the south is Plain of Esdraelon over which we rode yesterday on our way to Nazareth. Those mountains of His boyhood in His memory, do you remember that Christ when He wanted a good pit, made it out of a mountain—"seeing the altitudes He went up into the mountain." I when He wanted especial communion with I, He took James and John and Peter into "a mountain apart."

h, this country boy of Nazareth, come forth alone for the sins of the world, and to correct the follies of the world and to stamp out cruelties of the world and to illumine the blindness of the world and to transfigure the spheres! So it has been the mission of country boys in all ages to transform and fire and rescue. They come into our merchandise and our court-rooms and our healing and our studios and our theology. They died in Nazareth before they entered Jerusalem. I but for that annual influx our cities would be enervated and sickened and slain the late hours and hurtful apparel and over-digestive organs and crowding environments of city life, would have halted the world, the valleys and mountains of Nazareth have a fresh supply of health and moral invigoration to Jerusalem, and

The Country Saves the Town.
In the hills of New Hampshire and the hills of Virginia and the hills of Georgia into our national eloquence the Websters the Clays and the Henry W. Grady. From plain homes of Massachusetts and Maryland into our national charities the George bodys and the William Corcorans. From cabins of the lonely country regions come our national destinies the Andrew Jacksons the Abraham Lincolns. From plough boy's row and village counter and blacksmith's forge come most of our city giants. Nearly all Messiahs in all departments dwelt in Nazareth before they came to Jerusalem.

ut alas that the city should so often treat the country boys as of old the one from Nazareth treated at Jerusalem! Slain not by hammers and spikes, but by instruments just as old. On every street of every city

The Crucifixion Goes On.
Every year of our history shows its ten thousand of the slain. Oh, how we grind them under what wheels, in what mills and for what an awful grist! Let the city take better care of these boys and young men arriving in the country. They are worth saving. As grand as the one who with his elder brother climbed into a church tower and, not seeing their danger, went outside on some beams when one of those timbers broke and the boys fell and the older boy caught on a beam and the younger clutched the foot of the elder; the older could not climb up with the elder hanging by his feet, so the younger said: "I am going to let go; you climb out safely, but you climb up and I am holding you. I am going to let go; kiss me and tell her not to feel badly; good-bye!" and he dashed on the ground was not recognizable. Plenty of such brave boys coming from Nazareth! Let Jerusalem be careful to treat them! A gentleman long ago entered a school in Germany and he bowed very low before the boys and the teacher said: "Why do you do that?" "Oh," said the visitor, "I do not know what mighty man may yet be developed among them." At that instant the eyes of one of the boys flashed fire. Who was it? Martin Luther. A lad on his way to school passed a door-step on which sat a lame and invalid child. The passing boy said to him: "Why don't you go to school?" "Oh, I am lame and I can't walk to school!" "Get on my back," said the well boy, "and I will carry you to school." And so he did that day and for many days until the invalid was fairly started on the road to an education. Who was the well boy that did that kindness? I don't know. Who was the invalid he carried? It was Robert Hall, the rapt pulpit orator of all Christendom. Better give to the boys who come up from Nazareth to Jerusalem

A Crown Instead of a Cross.
On this December morning in Palestine on our way out from Nazareth we saw just such a carpenter's shop as Jesus worked in, supporting his widowed mother, after he was old enough to do so. I looked in, and there were hammer, and saw, and plane, and auger, and vice, and measuring-rule, and chisel, and drill, and adze, and wrench, and bit, and all the tools of carpentry. Think of it! He who smoothed the surface of the earth, shoving a plane. He who cleft the mountains by earthquake, pounding a chisel. He who opened the mammoth caves of the earth, turning an auger. He who wields the thunderbolt, striking with a hammer. He who scooped out the bed for the ocean, hollowing a ladle. He who flashes the morning on the earth, and makes the midnight heavens quiver with aurora, constructing a window. "I cannot understand it, but I believe it. A sceptic said to an old clergyman, 'I will not believe anything I cannot explain.' 'Indeed!' said the clergyman, 'You will not believe anything you cannot explain. Please to explain to me why some cows have horns, and others have no horns.' 'No!' said the sceptic, 'I did not mean exactly that. I mean that I will not believe anything I have not seen!' 'Indeed,' said the clergyman, 'You will not believe anything you have not seen. Have you a backbone?' 'Yes,' said the sceptic. 'How do you know?' said the clergyman. 'Have you ever seen it?' This mystery of Godhead and humanity interjoined I cannot understand, and I cannot explain, but I believe it. I am glad there are so many things we cannot understand, for that leaves something for heaven. If we knew everything here, heaven would be a great indolence. What foolish people, those who are in perpetual fret because they cannot understand all that God says and does. A child in the first juvenile primer might as well burst into tears because it cannot understand conic sections. In this world we are only in the A-B-C class, and we cannot now understand the libraries of eternity which put to utmost test faculties archangelic. I would be ashamed of heaven if we do not know more there, with all our faculties intensified a million-fold and at the centre of the universe, than we do here with our dim faculties and clinging to the outside rim of the universe.

JOSEPH, THE CARPENTER.

In Cana of Galilee.

In about two hours we pass through Cana, the village of Palestine, where the mother of Christ and our Lord attended the wedding of a poor relative and having come over from Nazareth for that purpose. The mother of Christ—for women are first to notice such things—found that the provisions had fallen short and she told Christ, and He to relieve the embarrassment of the housekeeper, who had invited more guests than the pantry warranted, became the butler of the occasion, and out of a cluster of a few sympathetic words squeezed a beverage of a hundred and twenty-six gallons of wine in which was not one drop of intoxicant or it would have left that party as maudlin and drunk as the great centennial banquet, in New York two years ago, left senators, and governors, and generals, and merchant princes. The difference between in Cana, and the wine at the banquet in New York being that the Lord made the one and the devil made the other. We got off our horses and examined some of these water-jars at Cana said to be the very ones that held the plain water that Christ turned into the purple bloom of an especial vintage. I measured them and found them eighteen inches from edge to edge and nineteen inches deep, and declined to accept their identity. But we realized the immensity of a supply of a hundred and twenty-six gallons of wine. What was that for? Probably one gallon would have been enough, for it was only an additional installment of what had already been provided, and it is probable that the housekeeper could not have guessed more than one gallon out of the way. But a hundred and twenty-six gallons! What will they do with the surplus? Ah, it was just like our Lord! Those young people were about to start in housekeeping, and their means were limited, and that big supply, whether kept in their pantry or sold, will be a mighty help. You see there was no strychnine, or logwood, or nux vomica, in that beverage, and, as it would keep. He makes seas that keep thousands of years and certainly He could make a beverage that would keep four or five years. Among the arts and inventions of the future I hope there may be some one that can press the juices from the grape and so mingle them and without one drop of damning alcoholism that it will keep for years. And the more of it you take the clearer will be the brain and the healthier the stomach. And here is a remarkable fact in my recent journey—I travelled through Italy, and Greece, and Egypt, and Palestine, and Syria, and Turkey, and how many intoxicated people do you think I saw in all those five great realms? Not one. We must in our Christianized lands have got hold of some kind of beverage that Christ did not make.

Oh, I am glad that Jesus was present at that wedding, and last December, standing at Cana, that wedding came back. Night had fallen on the village and its surroundings.

The bridegroom had put on his head a bright turban, and a garland of flowers, and his garments had been made fragrant with frankincense and camphor, an odor which the Oriental especially likes. Accompanied by groomsmen, and preceded by a band of musicians with flutes and drums, and horns, and by torches in full blaze, he starts for the bride's home. This river of fire is met by another river of fire, the torches of the bride and bridesmaids: flambeau answering flambeau. The bride is in white robe and her veil not only covers her face but envelops her body. Her trousseau is as elaborate as the resources of her father's house permit. Her attendants are decked with all the ornaments they own or can borrow; but their own personal charms make tame the jewels, for those Oriental women eclipse in attractiveness all others except those of our own land. The damask rose is in their cheek, and the diamond in the lustre of their eyes, and the blackness of the night in their long locks, and in their step is the gracefulness of the morning. At the first sight of the torches of the cry rings through the home of the bride: "They are in sight! Get ready! Behold the bridegroom cometh! Go ye out to meet him." As the two processions approach each other, the timbrels strike and the songs commingle, and then the two processions become one, and march toward the bridegroom's house, and meet a third procession which is made up of the friends of both the bride and bridegroom. Then all enter the house, and the dance begins, and the door is shut. And all this Christ uses to illustrate the joy with which the ransomed of earth shall meet Him when He comes garlanded with clouds, and robed in the morning and trumpeted by the thunders of the Last Day. Look! There He comes down off the hills of heaven, the Bridegroom! And let us start out to hail Him, for I hear the voices of the Judgment Day sounding, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh! Go ye out to meet Him!" And the disappointment of those who have declined the invitation to the Gospel wedding is presented under the figure of a door heavily closed. You hear it slam. Too late.

The Door is Shut!

But we must hasten on, for I do not mean to close my eyes to-night till I see from a mountain top, Lake Galilee, on whose banks, next Sabbath, we will worship, and on whose waters the following morning we will take a sail. On and up we go in the severest climb of all Palestine, the ascent of the Mount of Beatitudes, on the top of which Christ preached that famous sermon on the Blesseds—Blessed this and Blessed that. Up to their knees the horses plunge in mole-hills, and a surface that gives way at the first touch of the hoof, and again and again the tired beasts halt, as much as to say to the riders, "It is unjust for you to make us climb these steepes." On and up over mountain sides where in the later season, hyacinths, and daisies, and phloxes, and anemones kindle their beauty. On and up until on the rocks of black basalt we dismount, and climbing to the highest peak, look out on an enchantment of scenery that seems to be the Beatitudes themselves arched into skies, and rounded into valleys, and silvered into waves. The view is like that of Tennessee and North Carolina from the top of Lookout Mountain, or like that of Vermont and New Hampshire from the top of Mount Washington. Hail, hills of Galilee! Hail, Lake Genesaret, only four miles away! Yonder, clear up and most conspicuous, is Safed, the very city to which Christ pointed for illustration in the sermon preached here, saying, "A city set on a hill cannot be hid." There are rocks around me on this enough to build the highest pulpit the world ever saw. Aye, it is the highest pulpit. It overlooks all time and all eternity. The valley of Hattin between here and Lake Galilee is an amphitheatre, as though the natural contour of the earth had invited all nations to come and sit down, and hear Christ preach a sermon, in which there were more startling novelties than were ever announced in all the sermons that were ever preached. To those who heard Him on this very spot, His word must have seemed the contradiction of everything that they had ever heard or read or experienced. The world's theory had been: Blessed are the arrogant; Blessed are the supercilious; Blessed are the tearless; Blessed are they that have everything their own way; Blessed are the war eagles; Blessed are the persecutors; Blessed are the popular; Blessed are the Herods, and the Cæsars, and the Ahabs. "No! no! no!" says Christ, with a voice that rings over these rocks, and through yonder valley of Hattin, and down to the opaline lake on one side, and the sapphire Mediterranean on the other, and across Europe and around the earth both ways, till the globe shall yet be girdled with the nine beatitudes: Blessed are the poor, Blessed are the mournful, Blessed are the meek, Blessed are the hungry, Blessed are the merciful, Blessed are the pure, Blessed are the peacemakers, Blessed are the persecuted, Blessed are the falsely reviled.

Do you see how the Holy Land and the Holy Book fit each other? God with His left hand built Palestine, and with His right wrote the Scriptures, the two hands of the same Being. And in proportion as Palestine is brought under close inspection, the Bible will be found more glorious and more true. Mightiest book of the past! Mightiest book of the future! Monarch of all literature!

The proudest works of Genius shall decay,
And Reason's brightest lustre fade away;
The Sophist's art, the poet's boldest flight,
Shall sink in darkness, and conclude in night;
But faith triumphant over time shall stand,
Shall grasp the sacred volume in her hand;
Back to its source the heavenly gift convey.
Then in the flood of glory melt away.

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

The Meeting of Baptist Ministers in Brooklyn Last Week to Consider the Second Advent.

AN evidence of the rapid growth and extended influence of "the blessed hope" of our Lord's coming is given in the important conference held last week in Brooklyn. As prophecy leads us to expect, these conferences will become more numerous in all lands as the multiplying signs of the close of this dispensation are recognized by the Church at large. More than two thousand years ago, the prophet foresaw these days and their strange admixture of worldliness, scepticism, eager scientific inquiry and, on the part of the few, unprecedented earnestness in evangelical missionary labor, and said: "They that feared the Lord spake often one to another." Later, the great apostle had a prevision of the same time when believers would be mocked at, and asked: "Where is the promise of His coming? For since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning," and bade us "comfort one another with these words," and assured us that "the Lord is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness." So, the number of these conferences increases, and it is well that it should. They are a solace to those whose hearts fail them as they look at the comparatively meagre results of Gospel work. They give cheer as brother reminds brother of the certainty of final victory, when He comes whose right it is to reign, and directs his attention to the signs on every hand that "the night is far spent and the day is at hand." They are also an incentive to increased activity by impressing upon all who are present how brief is the opportunity left for gathering out of the world a people for the Lord.

Hitherto the conferences have been general, but now the number of those who are looking for the Lord's coming has so increased that a denomination alone furnishes more than sufficient studios believers to conduct a four day assembly. The Brooklyn conference last week was of Baptists exclusively, and it is hoped that other Churches will follow the example this year, and we may yet see in a Presbyterian, a Congregational, a Protestant Episcopal and other denominational conferences, clergymen of communions placing themselves on record on this all-important question. It would be an expression of faith in God's word much needed these unbelieving times.

The resolution to hold this conference was passed at a meeting of Baptist ministers held in Chicago on May 27, this year, and a regular society was organized to carry the resolution into effect. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, was elected President, and Dr. J. D. Herr, of Milwaukee, Wis., Secretary. Its object was avowedly to discuss and disseminate information concerning the pre-millennial coming of our Lord. An Executive Committee was composed of Samuel McBride, of Brooklyn; Rev. G. W. I. Well, of Parkersburg, W. Va.; Rev. F. L. Chapell, of Boston, with Rev. George C. Needham, Secretary. The first conference met in the Centennial Baptist Church, Brooklyn, on Nov. 18, and its sessions continued till Nov. 21.

The papers read were as follows: The Dispensation of the Spirit, by Rev. G. W. Folwell; Enduement of the Holy Spirit, by Dr. A. J. Gordon; Secularization of the Church, by Rev. F. Chapell; Spiritualization of the Church, by F. M. Ellis, of Baltimore, Md.; Is the Advent Pre-Millennial? by Rev. Alfred Harris, Waverly, Md.; Pre-Millennialism Optimistic, by Rev. L. M. Haldeman, of New York; Testimony to the Power of the Advent, by Rev. Clara Larkin, of Kennett Square, Pa.; The Spirit and the Word, by Rev. G. M. Stone, of Hartford, Conn.; The Prophetic Significance of the Circumstances, by Dr. J. D. Herr; Gospel of the Resurrection, by Rev. A. C. Dixon; Gospel of the Blessed Hope, by Prof. J. M. Stiffler; Gospel of the Freedom of Christ, by Rev. George C. Needham; Israel's Future, by Professor J. H. Gilmore; The Relation of Baptists to the Doctrine of the Second Coming, by Dr. A. J. Gordon. We expect to publish a full report of these addresses in future numbers of this journal.

MISSIONARY PERILS IN PERU.

ALTHOUGH our Government is at peace with the South American Republics, and the most amicable relations are supposed to exist, it seems that religious fanaticism and bitter intolerance have not yet been removed south of the Isthmus. Intelligence has been received in this city that Mr. F. Penzotti, one of the agents of the American Bible Society, an ordained clergyman of the M. E. Church, been lying in prison at Callao for several months past, for no greater offence than telling the story of the Gospel to a company of Christian believers and distributing copies of the Bible printed in the Spanish tongue. The ecclesiastical censors of that section denounced as "prohibited and immoral" efforts to secure his release through the influence of resident Americans have failed, and a case seems to have been made a test on the Jesuits who, it is said, instigated the arrest. Mr. Penzotti is a man of spotless character, a preacher of rare fervor and power. On a former occasion, says the Bible Society Record, he was arrested and sent to the common jail at Callao for a similar offence. After lying in prison for several days, he was liberated by the National Government. He is fairly well treated in the Callao jail; his church members visit daily and his relatives are allowed to see him often as they could wish. Threats have been made to arrest other colporteurs. Mr. Penzotti is greatly consoled by the reflection that his suffering makes for the cause of Christ, and there is a general agitation on the subject which may result in the Congress of the country legislating in behalf of liberty of worship.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Recovery of a Wandering Son—A Bride Restored by Habeas Corpus—A Curious Discovery of Hidden Wealth Grafting a Boy's Limb.

Prodigal Son was Found in a Cave, on Washington Heights, N. Y., on Nov. 8. For two years a wealthy jeweler doing business in Allegheny, Pa., has been searching for a son who mysteriously disappeared in December, 1888. He met with no success until Saturday week, when he received a dispatch from the police of Newburg, N. Y., stating that in answering his description was at police headquarters in that town. He had been found lying in a hole dug in the hill-side and had obtained food by begging from passers-by. The father did not wait to go home, but started at once for Newburg where he was delighted by finding that the boy was his long lost son. The father explained his freak by saying that he played truant from school on the day of his disappearance and was afraid to go home. He therefore ran away. For some months he managed to live by working on some farms in various parts of the county. Then he served as assistant cook on a steamer to New Orleans. On his return, having had enough of sea-life and being unable to obtain work, he had made his home in the cave and lived by begging. He was very thin and ragged and seemed to have suffered from the hardships he had endured. Probably, the father had known how gladly he would be welcomed home, he would have communicated with his father long ago. That is the case with wandering sinners, who need to be told that their Heavenly Father still loves them and is waiting to receive all who come to Him. (Ezek. 33 : 11.)

A Suit for the Recovery of a Wife was Tried before Judge Hare in Philadelphia on November 15. It came up on a suit of habeas corpus which had been sued out by a young man against his wife's mother. He said that shortly after their marriage his wife went to visit her mother and had not returned. He believed that she was being kept a prisoner. This was denied, and a Roman Catholic priest who was in court volunteered an explanation. He said that the wife was a member of his church and when he heard of her marriage to a young man, who was not a Catholic, he had informed her parents at the marriage was null and void. He had repeated the statement to the girl herself and on his advice she had voluntarily declined to return to the man who, in his opinion, was not her husband. The judge then called the wife to the bar and having questioned her as to the facts, told her that her marriage was perfectly valid. "If," he said, "you desire to break the contract and leave your husband, you are free to do so, but, on the other hand, if you desire to remain with him, you are also free to take that course. There is no one that has a right to interfere between you and sever your tie. Which is your choice?" "My husband," said the wife. The judge told her that she had chosen wisely, and the couple left the court together. It was thought that the girl's decision should be final as she was the one most concerned in the matter. It is much to be wished that a similar decision were given by every Christian when the temptations of Satan and the allurements of the world could separate him from his Lord. (Gal. 5 : 10.)

A Suicide's Letter Explaining His Reasons for his crime was found on November 11th in the cell of a Brooklyn jail, in which he had been confined. The man, who belonged to a much respected family, had been arrested for raising a fraudulent mortgage. Several years ago he was convicted of dishonesty while serving as clerk in the Brooklyn Post Office, and was sent to the penitentiary. Since then he had apparently been leading an honest life until he committed the mortgage fraud for which he was in prison awaiting trial. There was a strong probability that if he had lived and stood his trial he would have been acquitted, as his wife had effected a compromise with the complainant in the case and had notified him of the fact. His wife's devotion to him and her efforts on his behalf seem to have made the man more wretched than he was before. He killed himself in his cell, leaving a letter behind him, saying he should have done so before but for the hope that if he lived he might in a measure make amends for the misery he had brought on his self-sacrificing, devoted, loving wife. It was evident that he had not been oblivious of the doom of self-murderers, for he referred to it in his letter, but added that he had decided to take his chances of its being worse than the hell he had suffered on this earth. Evidently this sinner did not belong to the class whom David described as flourishing like a green bay tree. He had tasted the bitter fruits of sin already in this life. Yet he had not learned the lesson his punishment should have taught him, for instead of abandoning the sin that had brought him so much misery, and humbling himself before God, he added to it the awful crime of suicide. It is a common perversion. If every man whose sin has brought him sorrow quitted it for the future, the world would be transformed. It is now as it has always been, God "has stricken them but they have not grieved." (Jer. 5 : 3.)

An Unexpected Fortune has Fallen to a lawyer in New York. In December, 1885, a letter reached ex-judge Leonard from a man who was confined in the pavilion for the insane, in Bellevue Hospital. It was a wild incoherent epistle, which many men would have thrown into the waste-basket as the production of a lunatic. But the judge reading it carefully thought it might be written by a man under the pressure of deep indignation at being confined among lunatics while he was sane. He decided to take up the case. The man said that he was from the far West where he had been successful in mining, and had come to New York to see the city. He had met with some men who had joined him in a prolonged dissipation. He drank so heavily that he did not know for several days what he did nor where he had been. All his money was gone and he was quite demented. He was taken to Bellevue and was there pronounced insane and confined in the pavilion. He could not get the doctors to release him and became so excited that it was natural to believe him really insane. The lawyer fought his case in court and after a three days' argument before judge Donahue succeeded in getting him liberated. The lawyer did not cease his kindness then, but helped the man to get back to his western home. His gratitude was boundless, and though he had no money, he assured the lawyer that he would never forget him, and if he made money again he would prove his words. The lawyer has now received notice that his former client is dead and has left a will making him his heir. The estate is said to be worth a quarter of a million. If a man felt so grateful toward one who had by a little labor rescued him from a lunatic asylum, what ought to be the gratitude and love of the Christian to his Saviour, who gave His life to save him from eternal death? (John 3 : 17.)

A Curious Discovery of Hidden Wealth is reported by the Paris correspondent of a New York journal. He says that an old lady, who was reputed to be enormously rich, recently died in the French capital. She left no will, and the property was therefore divided among her nephews and nieces. They were disappointed as to the value of her estate, for there was very little to divide beside her household furniture. No one knew what had become of her money. The relatives had paid her assiduous court in her lifetime, in the hope of being handsomely remembered in her will. When, however, it was found how meagre were the portions they received from her estate, some very disrespectful things were said of her. In the division of the household effects, only one of the family was willing to accept a large oil painting of the deceased lady as a part of her share. She was a niece who was attached to her. In hanging up the portrait in her room at her home, the niece noticed a rent in the canvas at the back, which she at once proceeded to repair. To her amazement she found it was not a rent, but a pocket, in which there were bonds and securities to the value of fifty thousand francs ($10,000). There was also a legal paper with them, signed by the old lady, giving the whole amount to that nephew or niece, who loved her well enough to have her picture. The hypocritical professions of affection on the part of the expectant legatees had evidently not deceived the eccentric lady who devised this ingenious method of testing their sincerity. Such hypocritical professions are often made of personal devotion to God. But though they may deceive the Church we are warned that a hypocrite shall not come before God. (Job 13 : 15.)

The Sickness of a Favorite Cat has been exercising the ingenuity of an aristocratic family in New York. The animal is a fine Angora who has gained a reputation among the fashionable callers at her owner's house by her beauty and intelligence. She has been ailing recently, and a prescription was written for her by some person learned in the diseases of cats. But the animal obstinately refused to take the powder. It was mixed with different kinds of food, of which she was fond, but she could not be imposed upon in that way. An effort was made to administer it by force, but though the powder could be put in her mouth the cat would not swallow it. The owner of the cat sorrowfully concluded that as he could not make her understand that the medicine would do her good, she must be let alone to die, as a victim of her own obstinacy. Just then an Irish servant was engaged, and she, hearing of the trouble, declared she could make the cat take the medicine. She mixed it with a little grease, and rubbed it on the cat's sides. Pussy at once licked them clean and swallowed all the powder. Apparently her concern about her personal cleanliness and comfort was stronger than her aversion to the nauseous medicine. Sometimes, men have been led to receive spiritual remedies in a similar way. Especially is this so with lessons of humility and self renunciation which are good for the health of the soul, but are extremely unpalatable. They are learned, not so often in a time of inward need, as in the day of adversity when outward circumstances are overcast and the personal reputation is smirched. (Lam. 3 : 17-20.)

One of the Most Remarkable Surgical Operations ever attempted, was performed last week in New York. It was nothing less than the endeavor to graft a dog's bone on a human limb. The patient is a boy who was afflicted with a congenital malformation of the leg. All the measures to straighten it having failed, the surgeons decided to remove the malformed bone, and introduce a piece the same length. This connecting piece must be "living bone" or it would not knit. Recourse was had to a living dog which was mercifully rendered unconscious by anesthetics during the operation. A piece of bone of the required length was separated from the dog's leg, care being taken to retain its connection with the artery which nourished it, and the bone was then placed in the gap in the boy's leg. A bandage held the ends firmly in connection and they were left to grow together. A strong plaster-of-paris band holds the dog close to the side of the boy and the former is kept unconscious, so that it may not feel pain, nor twitch the bone out of place. The animal will so remain, being kept alive by nourishment artificially administered, until the boy's leg is firmly united by the living bridge. The surgeons are reasonably proud of the operation, and, if it fulfils their hopes, as seems probable, the boy will have still more reason to rejoice over it. The dog's part in the case is not so satisfactory, but the value of a dog's life is held cheap if it can minister to human welfare. If human bone had been necessary, probably no one would have loved the boy well enough to become lame that he might walk. Such a sacrifice would have demanded superhuman love. That was precisely the need of the race when the Son of God came to its rescue, and gave Himself to become "a living way consecrated for us through His flesh." (Heb. 10 : 20.)

THE WALK TO EMMAUS.

S. S. LESSON FOR DEC. 7, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 24: 13-27; GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 24: 26.

The Need of the Disciples—All their Hopes of the Kingdom Disappointed—The Women More Enlightened—The Risen Jesus Unrecognized—The True Redemption of Israel—The Blood-bought Bride—Her Risen Life—The Veil Taken Away—Christ's Exposition of the Word.

BEHOOVED it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into His glory?" (V. 26, R. V.) The words of the women to the Apostles "seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not." (v. 11.) Oh, how often an experience of Christ which was beyond our depth has appeared to us as vain, meaningless words! Let us beware of measuring others by ourselves. There may be depths of the knowledge of God in His word and by His Spirit that few of us have fathomed; therefore, instead of hastily condemning what we do not understand at first, let us, in holy reverence, and deep dependence on the Holy Spirit's teaching, search the Scriptures to see if these things are so. We have the promise of the eternal God that He shall guide us into all truth. But then we must be willing to be guided, and humble enough to learn how great is our ignorance that we may be led by the Spirit of God into all His truth.

Two of this unbelieving company "went that day into a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about three score furlongs, and they talked together of all these things which had happened." Ever since the first moment of their acquaintance with Jesus, they had never so needed His teaching as now. If they had believed the message of the women they would have had a solution of all their difficulties. Why did they not believe? The women in their simplicity had "remembered His words," and all was clear to them. But the Apostles were not so simple as the women. All their preconceived notions of the Messiah must fall if this death of shame, and this resurrection from the dead, were the real thought of God. It meant the end of the hopes of James and John to have places of distinction in His kingdom; it meant for Peter to be a nobody still, although Christ had spoken of committing to him the keys of the kingdom of heaven. The women had nothing to lose, but everything to gain, in a risen Saviour; in their following Jesus, the question had never arisen, "What shall we have therefore?" It was their Lord, and not themselves, on whom their eyes were fixed.

And yet these two disciples could not be silent about the matter. As they "communed together and reasoned, Jesus Himself drew near, and went with them." They wanted to know the truth, and Jesus wanted to reveal it to them. "The Lord is nigh unto all them which call upon Him, to all them which call upon Him in truth." (Psalms 145: 18.) He is more than ready to make Himself known to those who hunger after Him. But it was another Jesus who now walked with them and talked, "their eyes were holden that they should not know Him." Jesus, the Teacher of His disciples, the Healer, the Provider, the Master of winds and waves, was familiar to them; Jesus the crucified they had seen afar off, without understanding Him, but the risen One—no, they had no eyes which could discern Him.

Jesus says to all His disciples, "Lo, I am with you always," and yet how many of God's children take for granted that He is absent from them! How many require a stronger warrant for believing that He is present with them, than His word which says so! How many want some sensible proof, some feeling or a token of His presence! When we take for granted that He is with us

Because He Says So,

then we are able to take for granted that He is speaking to us by His Word and by His Spirit, we get into the habit of waiting upon Him, and our ear gets accustomed to the sound of His voice; and no circumstance, however trivial, will happen without our being able to hear in it what He has to say to us, so that our whole being becomes a listening ear to hear, a ready hand to do, a living sacrifice to suffer His will.

But the two disciples went on talking of Him in His unrecognized presence; they did not expect His company just then. "He said unto them, what words are these that ye exchange one with another as ye walk? And they stood still, looking sad. And one of them, named Cleopas, answering, said unto Him, 'Dost thou alone sojourn in Jerusalem, and not know the things which are come to pass there in these days?'" (R. V. margin.) To these disciples, unbelieving as they were, no political or social event, nothing in the commerce of the day, and no other subject was of importance but Jesus. They thought everyone else must be absorbed as they were, in this one theme. He said, "What things?" And Cleopas, in his answer, showed how much of unbelief lurked still in his heart. "Concerning Jesus of Nazareth," was his answer, "which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people." Was this all which Cleopas had to say of his Lord? Had he forgotten Simon Peter's avowal, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God?" Must it be that only a dying thief and a heathen centurion should be the witnesses at this tremendous crisis that Jesus was the Son of God? True, He had charged them to tell no man that He was the Christ till the Son of Man should be risen from the dead. (Matt. 16: 20; 17: 9.) But their very disbelief in His resurrection shut out from them an understanding of all else which had happened to Him.

"But we trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Their thoughts about the redemption of Israel were other than their Lord's, they looked for earthly prosperity and political freedom; He came to redeem from sin and all its consequences. The great act of redemption had taken place, the life blood of the victim had been slain, and yet these men were as though they understood not. And who does understand in its fullness the mystery of Christ's redemption; what that precious blood has purchased for us? Not only forgiveness,—in deep adoration we praise God for that, but from His open side, Jesus forms a Bride, bone of His bone, flesh of His flesh. Spirit of His Spirit, the Bride of the Lamb, with the nature and the Spirit of the Lamb, "dumb before her shearers,"—a bride who, like her Lord, resists not evil, loves her enemies, seeks not her own, lives not unto herself, but unto Him which died for her;—a bride who is "not of the world," even as He is not of the world. Separated from its spirit, rejecting its honors, despising its vanities, the world knowing her not, "because it knew Him not." As He came to be a new man, a second Adam, the head of a new race, so His bride walks "in newness of life." A life laid down by a cross taken up for His sake. His Bride follows Him in crucifixion. She is "crucified with Christ," that in His risen life,—a life of another order from that of man who seeks his own, and is a lover of his own self,—she may be of another order of being, living the Christ-life, not the fleshly self-life which men in general live down here. The Bride of Christ is "redeemed from among men," redeemed from the earth. (Rev. 14: 3, 4.) She does not walk on an earthly level or "mind earthly things," for her "citizenship is in heaven," and she counts all things but loss that she may win Christ, and be found in Him. Oh, it is another redemption of Israel, another redemption of the Gentiles, too, than that which Cleopas was looking for.

He could not but mention the assertion of the women, the vision of angels which they had seen, saying that He was alive, and the testimony of Peter and John that it was even so as the women had said, but that they saw Him not. And Jesus spoke severe words to them, "O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! Behooved not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into His glory? And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, He interpreted them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself." (R. V.) Veil after veil fell from before their eyes, as the very Light of the world shed His beams upon His written Word. The presence of Christ while reading His Word, what is there like it! All the lungs of a spiritual man expand to breathe in the atmosphere of heaven! The old familiar words he breathed, spoke; the law, the psalms, the prophets, all told of Him. They had the key all in the wondrous Person who walked with them, and yet they knew Him not. Oh, let never come to the Word of God but in His presence—there it will be opened to us. "The letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." It may not come to His Word as to another book. The Bible is a supernatural book, and only we yield to the presence and power of the living Word in the written Word can its truths be unlocked to us. This is why so many of God's children look upon the wondrous truths which God reveals to us as though they were mere possibilities, because they do not come with Himself to His Word in a yielded spirit ready to believe, to receive and to obey. He will "do His will shall know of the doctrine."

THE GIFFORDS OF ASTON.

A Story of the Sunday School Lesson for Dec. 7.

EVERY one for miles around Aston had heard of the Giffords. Long before the Revolution, a Gifford had lived in state in the great hall there, with a large retinue of servants, keeping open house and entertaining distinguished guests. The Hall and the large estates passed down from father to son through many generations, the old traditions of a family being retained, and respect for it grown through all the State.

It was in Reginald Gifford's time that a change came. The country people noticed that as young man he was "wild." They said they hoped he would sow all his wild oats before father died, for if he continued the life which the estate came into his hands not even the princely income of the Giffords could stand. They were disappointed, for the crop that came of Reginald's sowing was only wilder oats. Race-horses and gambling and fast life were his idea of happiness, and in a very short time he came to ruin. Within ten years of his father's death he was living in a small cottage on the estate the Giffords so long owned, a broken, prematurely aged man, with scarcely sufficient income to keep himself and his wife and son. He was no longer the brilliant, witty, genial man of former days, but gloomy and spiritless, with joy left in life.

Unhappily the mischief he had done was confined to himself. His example had done untold harm. For miles around, there were families mourning on account of his wrongdoing. Fathers and mothers had thought it honor for their children to be friends of young Gifford, and were now lamenting over sons and daughters ruined by his friendship. Directly and indirectly his influence had been pernicious and now, in his days of poverty, instead of kindly sympathy, which might have alleviated his lot, he encountered on the faces of men and women, who had looked up to him in former days, looks of hatred and resentment. The vacant chairs in many a home seemed to shout aloud to God for vengeance on the head of a man whose evil deeds had led to the despoiling of the home.

This result of his career of sin and sin added to the misery of Reginald Gifford's lot, he was a kindly man at heart who was so that any one should have suffered through him, but it was not the heaviest load—the most bitter drop of his cup—as it should have been. His grief was that he had lost his estate. As he stood at the door of his humble abode might that all the land as far as he could see either side once belonged to him, and that stately mansion, whose chimneys he could see above the trees, was once his home and had been the home of his fathers, but had been sold to pay his gambling debts, he would turn into a little room and shed tears of mortification he cursed his folly. Folly he always called though he might more appropriately have called it wickedness.

One gleam of hope, and only one, there was, and to that he clung. It was too late for him to regain that lost estate; but his son, Herbert, might do it. He denied himself the commonest necessities that the boy should have the best education. He trained him with but one object of ambition—to restore the lost glories of the fiefs and to recover possession of the ancestral estate. He would take the boy through the fields, show him the beautiful mansion and the tears beseech him so to study and so to live that, in his manhood, he should go forth to the world to win a large fortune and come back to redeem the estate. "The hope of seeing that day, Herbert," he said, "is all that keeps me alive. Toil as I might I could never cover it; and, besides, I have not your abilities, nor did I use my opportunities of getting a first-class education as you are using them. It depends on you my boy; I have confidence in you."

This was the burden of all his talk with his son, and when Herbert was away at school and college, Reginald Gifford would talk to his wife the same strain, and try to inspire her with the same hope. She, poor woman, thought less of the loss of fortune than of the misery that had come on the homes around them through her husband's misconduct. If Herbert could redeem the estate even that would not undo the mischief that had been done to others. As she thought of the desolated homes she felt that her own restoration to wealth and luxury would only make her more miserable.

One day, entering her husband's room, she found him fallen back in his chair in a faint, with a letter clutched convulsively in his hand. It was some time before he recovered consciousness, and then she learned the cause of his attack. The letter was from Herbert, who had just graduated, and it announced his determination to become a clergyman. What a disappointment that career would be to his father! The young man was aware, but his letter showed that he had been led of God to his decision. Reginald Gifford swore he would never see his son again, would disown him, would curse him on his dying day. All his dreams had come to nothing; all his hopes were crushed.

It was in Aston that Herbert Gifford chose to labor for Christ. Years of self-sacrificing, consecrated work he gave to that district. In the homes of the poor, at the bedside of the sick, by the graves of the dead his voice was heard, directing the gaze of the burdened and the sorrowing to the one Source of comfort and joy and peace. How the people loved him! His name was a household word. Old men called down blessings on his head, and the young looked to him for advice and help. The name of Gifford was never so loved, even in the days of his family greatness. The stain which the father had brought upon it was forgotten in the dust, with which the son had covered it. But Reginald Gifford refused to be comforted, and would not realize that his son had done anything for him.

By none was Herbert more beloved than by the present owner of the estate, which was once the property of the Giffords. To the young clergyman's efforts, he owed it under the blessing of God that his only son, and heir had been rescued from a sinful life, and had become a new man in Christ Jesus. He loved Herbert as his own son, and it was with peculiar joy that he welcomed him into the family, when Herbert, some years later, asked him for the hand of his daughter in marriage. He insisted on Herbert coming to live with him in the house of his forefathers, and, when trouble came upon the house, and the father stood by the side of his dying son, he leaned on Herbert as his comfort in his sorrow, and was cheered by the thought that so good a man would succeed him when he too should come to die. And all Aston rejoiced that again a Gifford would reign in the old Hall.

THE TWO WITNESSES.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE, F. R. S. T.

WHEN the Lord opens the seventh seal (Rev. 8: 1), "there is silence in heaven about the space of half-an-hour;" a silence of intense amazement and awe, and now the question rises in every heart, when and how is all this to end? And what is to issue next from the remaining page of that dread Book? But before proceeding to investigate this, we must try to ascertain

Who The Witnesses Are;

And what has been, up to this time, their testimony and their mission.

These Witnesses are two in number; no more; two persons; two individual men. No interpretation can be right which does not maintain strictly this duality. They are two prophets, ver. 10. They are clothed with sackcloth, ver. 3. They prophesy, ver. 3. They have power, like Moses, to turn the waters into blood, and to smite the land with plagues, ver. 6. They are slain, ver. 7. Their dead bodies lie three days and a half in the street of the great city where the Lord was crucified, ver. 8. Thousands see these bodies dead; exult over them, and refuse to let them be put in graves, ver. 9. These dead bodies rise on the fourth day; stand on their feet reanimated by the Spirit of life: they ascend to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies behold them descend, ver. 12.

It is impossible then, in the face of these facts, to doubt that these witnesses are two in number, and only two; not two bodies of men, not two testifying churches; but two individual men; men who speak, and act, and live here for a time; men who are slain here; whose bodies lie in the street dead and insulted, and are seen to rise and ascend at a call from heaven. They come from standing in presence of the Lord; yet are they men in the flesh. They have not as yet put on immortality. They can die.

But if individual men—prophets who as yet have not died, yet been absent from the earth for a time, and standing in the Presence above—can we learn from any Scripture intimation, or Scripture facts, who and what they are? Now the Scriptures do tell of and only two—the one a Witness for God in the old world, the second a Witness for Him since the flood—who for some great end have been caught up to the Divine Presence; who have not as yet tasted death; and who may be, so far as we know, reserved for a death and resurrection that shall yet impress men and glorify the Son of God. As to the one of these is no room for doubt. We know that He is to come back. The Old Testament closes with the distinct promise and prediction that He shall come. "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me. . . . Behold I will send you Elijah the Prophet" (the Sep. Arab. and Old Latin versions read, "Elijah the Tishbite") "before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord"; (Mal. 3, 1; 4, 5, 6.) This is God's word; plain, definite, inevitable. And the Lord Himself when here renewed the promise, and confirmed the prediction.

It is before "the Great and Dreadful Day of the Lord" that Elijah is to come; but that day has not yet broken on the earth. When Elijah comes, he is "to restore all things;" but that restitution is not yet, nor will it be till the Lord Himself is descending; for "the heaven must receive Him until the times of restitution." (Acts 3: 21). Not till then will Israel be finally restored, nor this world be re-established from the wreckage of the fall, and its devastation under the Man of Sin.

As to the second, the facts seem to point to Enoch. While he lived here, he was emphatically God's "witness" to that world that perished by the flood; emphatically God's "prophet," who spoke to that generation of judgment. We do not know one word he ever uttered save that prediction recorded by Jude: "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convict all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against Him." (Jude 14: 15.) These words, it is plain, do not bear so specially on the near judgment of the flood, as they do on the judgment of the coming day, when He who is "the King of kings and Lord of lords" descends in flaming fire, to take vengeance on them that know not God, and when the "Armies of heaven follow Him." (II. Thess. 1: 8; Rev. 19: 14.) For what end then have the words of Enoch been placed on record, except to stamp him as the Prophet of the Coming Judge?

For one thousand two hundred and sixty days, and no more

is to last. During these days they prophesy clothed in sackcloth. They are resisted, hated, feared, by men and by the Man of Sin. But no fear can daunt, no opposition withstand them. They have come here to execute a mission, and, till that is finished, they are immortal. They are here not only to revive and sustain the faith of those who will be true to God; but to confront the reigning Power; and to prove to a deceived world that the day of the wrath of God and of the Lamb is come. As Enoch did once before stand up alone in that world so soon to perish, to testify of the coming judgment and the coming judge; to compel men to decision; to flee from the wrath, or to face the perdition; so now he testifies to the Gentile nations. As Elijah, when he stood on Carmel, in the face of Ahab and the priests of Baal, compelled his nation to decide:—"If Jehovah be God, follow Him; if Baal be God, then follow him." (1. Kings 18: 21). So it is now. They both speak with the tongue of fire; the one prophet to the nations, the other to the Jews. It is no longer a halting time; the decision must be instant, and it is final. If Jehovah be God, follow Him; if the dragon be God, then follow him.

And ere this mission is ended a great and glorious victory is gained for the Son of God. From the nations there is that no man can number. Left behind, not ready when "the wise" ascended, they have had a message of mercy by these two celestial prophets from the Son of God; and so, raised by them from their desponding state, encouraged to wash their robes in the blood of the Lamb, their faith fed by the Divine oil, they have stood in life and death steadfast, and, having come through that time of great tribulation more than conquerors, it is they that now stand on the floor of heaven, dressed in white robes, with palms in their hands, and lift aloud their song of praise, "Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb."

And in Israel, as mighty in these days is the triumph of grace. The voice of Elijah is heard calling them back from every land to the Covenant of God, to their Redeemer and their King; and they come. This great awakening begins in Judah and Jerusalem; an opening of the heart, a true repenting and contrition, a reviving of the nation's faith, such as has never been since the day of Josiah's Passover. Then is fulfilled that promise; "I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplication: and they shall mourn for Him as one that mourneth for his only son. . . . And in that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness." Zech. 12: 9-14; 13: 1.

MORALS OF DENTISTRY.

A CARD was published by a dentist some time ago giving the names of prominent persons, among others a list of clergymen, from whom he had excavated successfully and without pain certain diseased molars. The dentist, in making the operation painless, has spoiled a proverb—"It comes as tough as drawing teeth." Still we are glad that these clerical brethren, without suffering, have shed their masticatory instruments. We would have almost any one else hurt rather than they. They are not of the belligerent sort, who are constantly "showing their teeth," and we therefore could have no joy in their painful extraction. May the remaining incisors and bicuspid of these brethren be spared, and the time be long distant when Solomon's description shall apply to them: "The grinders cease because they are few." We now seriously call the attention of all young clergymen to the importance of ecclesiastical dentistry. When a minister's teeth begin to decay, his theology is apt at the same time to suffer. Poor teeth result in poor mastication; poor mastication in poor digestion; poor digestion in poor spirits; poor spirits in poor theology. Keep out of your mouth all poisonous dentifrices; do not wear off the enamel with pen-knife or pin; annually submit yourself to the inspection of a wise dentist; twice a day at least, with strong brush, keep your mouth as pure as the Gospel that drops from your lips. An untidy minister, neglectful of a full-length bath, his finger-nails unscrapped, his knuckles begrimed, his collar looking as if it had lost its way to the wash-tub, and his teeth tobacco stained, is as disgusting to us as the Egyptian mummies in the British Museum, which lie grinning with their decayed molars exposed, three thousand years of bad toothache. There might seem to be some excuse for the wicked postponement of dentistry if it were as excruciating as it used to be. In boyhood, after our crying all night, laudanum and camphor and everything else having failed, father took us to the village doctor. The doctor led us to the back piazza, and we sat down on the step. Whether we were promised candy, or a ride, or a new pair of boots, we do not remember, but suffice it to say the inducement did not seem adequate to pay for the sufferings proposed. The doctor brought out a long pair of forceps. There were in its very looks twists and grips, and clutches that made the toothache instantly stop. Then we argued the uselessness of extraction, because it did not ache a bit. They did not allow us to finish the argument. We were never more logical in our life. We had laid down the two propositions of a syllogism. First, painless teeth ought not to be extracted; secondly, this is a painless tooth; but before we could draw the conclusion the doctor had begun to draw the tooth. We sitting on the step, and he standing back and above us, took our head between his knees, one knee tight against each ear. The memory of those knees will never fade away from us. They seemed to us the ne plus ultra of all knees.

He had hard work to get into our mouth, for it was so full of acclamation, or what boys call "holla," a word so expressive that we never found its synonym. But getting his hand on one side the unrestrained yell, and his turn-key on the other, he went in. But at last the cold steel was laid aside the sore gums, and while we were clutching the doctor's arm, and biting his fingers as hard as we could, and kicking indiscriminately in all directions, and giving him a look as much as to say: "Old fellow, if I live to get over this, won't I give it to you," the doctor, with knees still more tightly braced, gave one resolute pull, and it seemed as if the roots of the neck had given way, and the jaw-bone had forsaken its socket, and everything, down to the last joint of the toe, had been dislocated, grubbed out, smashed, caved in, and annihilated with a general convulsion. The operation was successful. The dentist only did his duty, and has been for some years in the good place where teeth never ache and they never use forceps; but my memory of him is not ecstatic. We do not take him into our hope of future recognition. We can think of five hundred people whom we would rather meet than he. But in this day things are made easy. According to the advertisement, tooth-drawing has passed into the luxuries, and the dentist's chair is almost as easy as the editor's.

SELF-TREATMENT.

THERE are books proposing that we all become our own medical attendant. Whenever we are seized with any sort of physical disorder we are to take down some volume in homœopathy, allopathy, hydropathy, and running our finger along the index, alight upon the malady that may be afflicting us. We shall find on the same page the name of the disease and the remedy. Thus: chapped hands, glycerine; cold, squills; lumbago, mustard-plasters; nervous excitement, valerian; sleeplessness, morphine powders.

This may be very well for slight ailments, but we have attended more funerals of people who were their own doctor, than obsequies of any other sort. In your inexperience you will be apt to get the wrong remedy. Look out for the agriculturist who farms by book, neglecting the counsel of his long-experienced neighbor. He will have poor turnips and starveling wheat, and kill his fields with undue apportionments of guano and bone-dust. Look out just as much for the patient who in the worship of some "pathy," blindly adheres to a favorite hygienic

In ordinary cases the best doctor you can have is a mother or grandmother who has piloted through the rocks of infantile disease whole family. She has a salve for almost everything, and knows how to bind a wound or cure an inflammation. But if the mother be dead, you are afflicted with a maternal ancestor who never knew anything practical and never will be better in severe cases have the doctor, right away. You say that it is expensive to do this while a book on the treatment of diseases will cost you only a dollar and a half. We reply that in the end it is very expensive for an inexperienced man to be his own doctor; for in addition to the price of the book there are the undertaker's expenses.

THE OLD GOSPEL.

THE air is full of talk against catechisms and creeds and the theology of the past. One might be led to suppose that the loose theological talkers of the world were doing the good, upholding all the beneficent institutions, and that the men who believe in the Gospel out-and-out, in-and-in, were fossils on the shelf. Take out of the past John Calvin and John Wesley, and Martin Luther and John Howe, and Richard Cecil and Jonathan Edwards and the Scotch Covenanters, and how much the best part of the world's history would be destroyed. They all believed in a creed, whether written or unwritten; and adopted the whole Bible. All that the sceptics and loose religious thinkers have done for the Church and the world, you can put in a quart jug, and have room left for a full quart beside. While the men pass their time tinkering Christianity, hoping to repair it until it shall be fit for the acceptance of this enlightened age, the plain Gospel goes on making its grandest triumphs, building larger churches and more magnificent universities. If there were not calamity mingled with the farce, we should laugh day and night to see these mighty hunters shooting the Rock of Ages.

JOYOUS RELIGION.

Who are the happy Christians? The busy Christians. Who are the Christians in the slough of despond? The idle Christians. He is a wood and it is filled with Summer insects. An axeman comes along to hew fire-wood for next Winter. He throws off his coat and heaves mightily against the trees, and every stroke the axe makes the insects fly away, and the harder he works the less he is annoyed by the insects. Here is a man who comes and lies down in the woods, and he is stung and mauled by the insects, and he thinks it is a horrible place to stay in. The world is full of insect annoyances. Those are comparatively free from annoyances who are busy for God and busy in the Church. It is the man who lies down in the Church and lies down in the fields when he ought to be useful, and lies down in the forest of God's love, who is stung, and stung, and stung, and blotched all over with inefficiency and spiritual death.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Launch of the Cruiser "Maine"—A Money Panic Averted—The Threatened Indian Rising—Death of a Noted Clergyman—A Royal Wedding at Berlin, Etc.

The Greatest and Most Formidable Warship ever built in America, the Maine, was launched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard on the 18th inst. Compared with the other vessels of Uncle Sam's service, the new cruiser is a monster, being 324 feet 4 inches in length over all, 318 feet 3 inches on the water line, 57 feet in breadth, 21 feet mean draught, 6,682 tons displacement and with an estimated speed of seventeen knots an hour. Her engines are of the vertical cylinder, triple expansion type, and the total horse-power is estimated at 1,000. She will have twin screws and will be armed with 32 guns of various sizes and calibre and seven torpedo tubes. Some of her guns, experts say, will have a penetrating power at 4,000 yards that will pierce 20 inches of iron. All her armor or plated covering will be of nickel steel and this alone will weigh nearly two and a half million pounds, the side armor belt being 12 inches thick and extending over a length of 180 feet. She will also have a couple of turrets with protected guns. Such a vessel could have blown the Merrimac or the Monitor out of the water, yet, although strongly armed and very swift, she will hardly rank with some of the great ocean floating fortresses of the foreign powers, although her high rate of speed would certainly give her a powerful advantage over their heavier but slower naval vessels. Miss Wilmerding, Secretary Tracy's granddaughter, performed the ceremony of "christening the ship," at the launching, which was witnessed by thousands of spectators, including many high government officials. A picture of the Maine is given above.

The Great Agitation Over the "New Christ" among the Sioux Indians at Walker Lake, Nevada, has not diminished during the week. It now seems that Sitting Bull, (whose portrait is given in this column), is the instigator of the excitement, and that a Pah Ute Indian, named John Johnson, has been chosen to represent, to the deluded red men, the Saviour of the World. His extraordinary doctrines have already been outlined in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Settlers are greatly afraid of an Indian outbreak, and are flocking into the town of Mandan, in North Dakota. Governor Miller has ordered a large force of troops for duty.

The settlers believe that the religious craze is simply a cloak to cover an intended rising and probable massacre, and they are arming with the determination of killing all the Indians in the disturbed district, if found there after a certain date. Gen. Miles, commander of the United States, troops in the territory, says the military is able to cope with any disturbance that may arise. Meanwhile, great crowds of Indians are assembled at Standing Rock Agency, some 6,000 in all being there at the present time, and as they are known to be in possession of hundreds of rifles and plenty of ammunition, their gathering is interpreted as meaning serious trouble. Sitting Bull and his band have left the agency, and are said to be on the warpath. There are already rumors of a fight having taken place between the Indians, and General Brooke's command near Pine Ridge.

Although the Spectre of Financial Panic has hovered over the country for a week or more, it is now generally believed that the danger of a serious money crisis is averted for the present at least. The embarrassment of the great banking-house of Baring Brothers in England, which was rescued from failure by the action of the Bank of England alone, naturally produced a depressing effect in money circles all over the world. The Rothschilds have guaranteed the $20,000,000 interest on the Argentine Republic's loans. Now that the trouble abroad is substantially adjusted, apprehensions here are quieting down. There have been several small failures during the week in New York, the only one of consequence being that of Barker Bros. & Co., Philadelphia, with $3,000,000 liabilities. Stocks are still very low, and money has been held tight. The banks have done much to relieve the situation by encouraging the taking out of loan certificates, authorized by the New York Clearing-house. This has relieved matters somewhat in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and other commercial centres in the East. Besides, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury showing that the government has $32,000,000 available for emergencies, and that the revenues for the year were $105,000,000 more than the expenditures, has increased confidence in the situation, and allayed disquieting rumors.

Another Royal Wedding was Celebrated with great pomp in Berlin, on the 19th, being the marriage of the Emperor William's sister, Princess Victoria, and Prince Adolphus of Schaumburg-Lippe. The civil ceremony took place in the palace of the Empress Frederick, in presence of an imposing array of royalties and at its conclusion the entire party, escorted by a body of cavalry, proceeded to the Imperial Castle where the religious ceremony was performed by Rev. Dr. Dryander, the court chaplain. Afterward, there was a grand banquet at which Emperor William was the principal speaker. The bride is a sweet-faced girl with an excellent disposition, very amiable and quite accomplished. She is said to inherit much of the fine diplomatic tact of her mother, the Empress Frederick. Her wedding-dress was of cream satin with lace and a train embroidered with wild roses and silver, and she wore a royal crown and a wreath of myrtle and orange blossoms. Prince Adolphus is said to be a prime favorite of the Emperor and is regarded as a rising man. His estates, however, do not yield him a vast income, by any means. Portraits of the bride and groom are given above.

A Hot Fight is Just Now Waging Among the Irish Nationalists over the suggested retirement of Parnell, in consequence of the recent disclosures affecting his reputation in the case lately decided against him by the English courts. While his usefulness as a leader of the Irish party seems to have been greatly impaired, the National League have resolved to stand by him, although there is a possibility that the pressure may become so strong as to force him out of active politics. Many of the newspapers which formerly professed a warm admiration for the "Uncrowned King," now urge his retirement as a duty he owes to his country.

Few Congregationalists Were Better Known in this country than Henry M. Dexter, who passed away at his home in New Bedford, Mass., last week. He was born at Plympton, Mass., in 1821, graduated from Yale and Andover and had his first pastoral charge in Manchester, N.H. He afterwards occupied the pulpit of the Berkeley Street Church, in Boston, for eighteen years.

For twenty years past he had devoted his wonderful energies largely to authorship, and as the editor of the Congregationalist, no less than as the writer of a large number of volumes on theology and Church matters, he became widely recognized as an authority on Congregational affairs. His most important work is: The Congregationalism of the Last 300 Years as Seen in its Literature; With Special Reference to Certain Recondite, Neglected or Disputed Passages. His other works include: As to Roger Williams and His Banishment; The True Story of John Smith; and A Biography of the Church Struggle in England During the 16th Century. Rev. Dr. Dexter was distinguished as a controversialist and his lectures in Boston and elsewhere attracted large and cultured audiences. In all the prominent Church controversies of the last thirty years he has been a prominent figure. His portrait is given in this column.

BRIEF NOTES.

General Booth of the Salvation Army announces that he has received $100,000 toward the amount necessary to establish his scheme of social reform, outlined in these columns last week. He has received a letter from the secretary of the Queen, containing an expression of her Majesty's sympathy with his effort.

Christian business men are asked to aid in the effort to secure the closing of the Columbian World's Fair on Sundays by sending to the National Reform Association, 1520 Chesnut St., Philadelphia, letters written on their business letter heads, saying, "We join," or "This firm joins in the citizens' protest against the opening of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday."

Evangelist Ben Hogan and Lieutenant Thomas Lavery have been holding meetings at Spokane Falls, Wash. Concordia Hall in which the services have been held was crowded by the class the evangelists were trying to reach. Some of the conversions were of men previously most strongly opposed to religion. The pastors of the city are heartily co-operating and are trying to keep the evangelists there for another month.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is laid aside by a severe attack of his chronic malady, rheumatic gout. In former years he has left England for the South of France before the November fogs appeared, but this year being anxious to continue his labors he delayed his departure too long and this illness is the consequence. He desires the prayers of our readers for his restoration to health. During his illness we shall publish the sermons he has been recently delivering on Sunday evenings.

A wonderful outpouring of God's blessing has been experienced at Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, since Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., became its pastor. There has been a special work going on among the young men of the congregation with most interesting results. At the communion on November 16, no less than one hundred and ninety were received on profession of faith besides twenty by letter from sister churches. A picture of Bethany Church and a portrait of its pastor appeared in this journal on September 24.

Seventeenth Street M. E. Church, New York, was crowded on Sunday, November 16, by a congregation eager to hear Rev. Thomas Harrison, who, as had been extensively advertised, had promised to commence a series of services there. Mr. Harrison, however, did not come and the congregation went away grievously disappointed. This was the more keenly felt because on two previous occasions at that church the services had to be deferred for the same reason, though Mr. Harrison's presence had been confidently expected.

We regret to hear that the Rev. J. F. Avery, of the Mariners' Temple, New York, whose portrait and sketch of his work appeared in this journal on November 12, has experienced a serious loss. A fire in his residence has destroyed his library, manuscripts, and other effects. We are sure he will have the sympathy of our readers, and that they will be the more ready to help him in prosecuting his evangelistic work. We have learned since writing the sketch of him that he was trained for the ministry in Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Pastors' College.

THE TERMS OF BENEDICTION.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Aaron Authorized to Bestow Blessings—The Blessing Christ Gives—His Last Act on Earth—Will Come Again in the Same Attitude—I. The Character of the Blessing—Given Through a Priest—Partakes of Intercession—A Fiat as well as a Prayer—The Blessing Sure—II. The Blessing Itself—From the Father—The Grace of the Son—Fellowship of the Spirit—III. The Divine Amen.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel; and I will bless them." Numbers 6: 22-27.

THE Lord has blessed His people, and He would have them know it. To bring this blessing constantly to remembrance the Lord appointed a representative of Himself who should publicly pronounce His blessing upon the people. He chose Aaron, and He bade Moses instruct him. Aaron was not only to offer sacrifice, and to make intercession, but he was to take a higher stand, and bestow blessings, in the name of God, upon the assembled people. Those who are old may fitly pronounce a blessing upon their children, as Jacob did upon his twelve sons; and the minister of Christ may, in God's name, pronounce a benediction upon the people. Our God has appointed One above all others to bless His people, even our great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the antitype of Aaron and his sons; and in the exercise of His high office continually blesses His people. He began His ministry with the Sermon on the Mount, and the word "Blessed." His whole life was a stream of blessing; for "He went about doing good." When He rose to heaven, having completed His ministry, it was as "He lifted up His hands, and blessed them."

"He Shall so Come in Like Manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven," bringing blessings with Him, even gifts for men. The great blessing which our Lord Jesus Christ pronounces is for His people, even for those to whom He gives eternal life. Ask yourselves whether you are believers, as Jacob was? Are you pleaders with God, as Jacob was? It was through his triumphant wrestling with God that he won the princely name of Israel: have you ever prevailed in prayer? If so, though you may feel very feeble, and halt as you come from the scene of conflict, yet to you, even to you, as being spiritually of the seed of Israel, the Lord Jesus Christ, the "High Priest of our profession," has given the blessing. But if any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ there is no blessing for him, since that awful text thunders at him: "Let him be Anathema Maranatha"—accursed at His coming. The Lord grant that such a curse may lie on none of us; but may we, as we hear the priestly benediction, be able by faith to receive it as our own!

I. First, then, consider the general Character of this Blessing.

It was a blessing, in the first place, given through a priest. Not every man might take upon himself to bless the people: it was Aaron—God's high priest, who offered sacrifice for the people—who was called to bless the tribes. The hands which had been stained with the blood of the victim, were outstretched in blessing. Once in the year the Lord's high priest went in unto God for the people, not without blood; and when his solemn duties within the veil had been duly done, he came forth, and put on those glorious garments which for awhile he had laid aside, and he blessed the people, as he was authorized to do. From which I gather that we can get no blessing from God, except through the priesthood of Christ. There must be the sacrifice, and the sprinkling of the blood, before the music of the blessing can sound in our ears. It is a priestly benediction, sealed with sacrificial blood; and it can only be bestowed by our glorious Priest.

Next, this benediction is of the nature of intercession. There lies within these words a prayer. "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee" is the cry of the man of God to Jehovah, that He will bless and keep His people. We have a high priest, through whom all that come to God will be accepted, "seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them." He is exercising that office now. How much we owe to His intercession no tongue can tell. Try to learn a little of it from these words, "Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."

"I Have Prayed for Thee":

Here is safety. Believe, my brethren, that our Lord has prayed for us, is praying for us still. With His quick eye of love He has perceived our danger long before we have dreamed of it; and with His eloquent tongue of earnestness He has pleaded the causes of our soul at the throne of grace, before we were aware of our peril. "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask Him"; and even so your heavenly High Priest perceives what you have need of, and asks for it long before you think of presenting such a petition.

But, next, this benediction is yet of a higher order than intercession. This benediction wears the form of a fiat as well as of a prayer. The priest here speaks the blessing for which he asks. Turning to the Father, our Lord Jesus cries, "Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me." Turning to us He says, "the Lord bless thee, and keep thee." What He prays for of God He distributes among men, by an authority vested in Him by the Father. "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fullness dwell." My heart delights to think of the Lord Jesus Christ at this hour, not as a Gethsemane pleader, with groans, and agony, and bloody sweat; but as one who has finished His work, and who now reigns in the glory of the Father, having all power in heaven and in earth.

Notice, in the next place, that this blessing is sure. Aaron did not bless the people of his own will; he did not utter good words of his own composing; but there went forth a divine power which made the form of blessing to be a blessing indeed. There was because Aaron was appointed to bless the people, and when he pronounced the benediction over the assembled multitude it was not Aaron's blessing, but the blessing of Jehovah, who had sent him. The God who set him apart to bless the people in the divine name was, by that very act and deed, engaged to make good His servant's words. Even so our blessed High Priest took not this office upon Himself, but He was called thereunto; and His call is abundantly certified, "For Him hath God the Father sealed."

But there is another reason for being certain that the benediction is sure to all the seed. Not only was the person chosen to bless the people, but the very words which he should use were put into his mouth. "On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them." Here we have a fixed form of benediction, to which Aaron was to restrict himself. I like this; for if God Himself puts the very words into the mouth of his priest, then they are God's words. God Himself arranged the of blessing, and commanded Aaron to say so much and no more. Not according to his own mind, or wish, or tenderness, or narrowness, does Aaron bless; but according to God's own mind must the fixed and predetermined benediction be given forth. Blessed be the name of God; the benediction is thus assured to us, for the words are His own. Even so the Lord hath put into the Saviour's mouth the words of blessing for us. Jesus said, "I speak not my own words, but the words of Him that sent me."

I would add that this blessing came frequently. We do not know how often Aaron uttered this blessing upon the people. In this passage it is left without any determination as to times and seasons. It is something like our Saviour's Memorial Feast: we are nowhere told when and how often we are to celebrate the Supper of the Lord. Although it seems to me to have been the practice in apostolic times to break bread on the first day of the week, there is no law laid down. It is put thus: "This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." So Aaron is not told that on such a day, and at such an hour, he shall bless the people; but he may do as his heart dictates. The Lord Jesus is ready still to bless us. Have you few blessings? You limit them yourselves. You are not straitened in Him; you are straitened in your own bowels. There is for you a blessing every morning: seek it when you wake. There is for you a blessing every evening: rest not till you feel it. There is a blessing for you at midnight, when you keep the watches wearily; and there is a blessing for you at midday, when you bear the noontide heat of care and toil. Thy "blessing is upon thy people": that is to say, it is always upon them.

II. We will consider

The Blessing Itself.

Notice, carefully, that this benediction passes from the priest to God. It runs thus: "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make His face shine upon thee: the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." Every blessing must come directly from God. What an honor was put on Aaron, to be made the mouth-piece of God! What an honor is put upon the preacher when he becomes the instrument, in God's hand, for cheering His people! But, I pray you, never rest in the blessing of a man. Nay, if you were sure that such a man were sent of God, and he should, with all earnestness, invoke the best benison upon you, be not content with the man, but press on to the Master. Seek to have blessing first-hand from heaven. Covet a good man's blessing, and count it a treasure; but value it only because God speaks through the man.

This fact makes the blessing exceedingly precious. "The Lord bless thee." What a blessing the Lord gives! His benediction sheds joy and glory over our entire manhood. "The Lord bless thee"—what an ocean of blessedness is in it! "And keep thee"—what safe keeping is that! "The Lord make His face to shine upon thee"—what a shine is that! "And be gracious unto thee"—what grace is that!—the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. "The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee"—oh, to be countenanced of God! what fellowship that means!—"And give thee peace." What a peace is that which God gives—the peace of God which passeth all understanding!

A Triune Blessing.

Taking the three sentences in the light now cast upon them the first sentence, "The Lord bless thee and keep thee," may be regarded as the benediction of the Father. It is the preservation of love. It is God who has hitherto kept you from falling. We are "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." "He will keep the feet of His saints." "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." To the Father's tender care I would, at this hour, commend each one of you: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee." May He do this when thou art in great temptation, that thou yield not! May He keep thee from thine own evil heart of unbelief, that thou turn not aside. Contending with a sinful world, may He keep thee from its snare! Marching through a region full of seductions to error, may He keep thee from quitting the truth. The Lord bless thee with all good, and keep thee from all evil. They are well kept whom God keeps, and none are kept besides. There is no keeping like divine keeping. We pray, "Lead us not into temptation: but deliver us from evil," and the prayer is to "Our Father in heaven."

The next clause is the benediction of the Son, or the joy of grace: "The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee." This means the favor of God; may it be given to each one of you! You know where God's face we read of "The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." He that hath seen Jesus hath seen the Father. When our Lord smiles on us, we see the face of God—that face not veiled with frowns, but bright with smiles: a face full of love and favor, a face which was once turned away, but is now turned towards us in peace. May we always walk in the light, as God is in the light; but that must be through the shining of His face. Through Jesus Christ we may enjoy in eternal sunshine.

To You That Are in Trouble

To-day, may He be gracious with His consolations. To you that are fighting for Him, may He be gracious in covering your head in the day of battle. To you that labor, may He put underneath you the everlasting arms of grace; and so may you have grace upon grace, and all the graces that you want till you enter into glory. Surely this second benediction is as full as it is brief.

The third blessing is surely that of the Holy Ghost. "The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." Here is the fellowship of peace. I pray that you may say, "I have the countenance of God. No one applauds me: I am obscure. Many criticize me, and say that I am mistaken: others cavil and abuse. But, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me, and it will more than suffice." To be countenanced by God is better than being commended by princes. Then follow the words, "And give thee peace": for when a man knows that God countenances him, then he enters into peace. Why should he fret when God smiles? What matters though all the world should censure, if Jehovah Countenance His Servant.

But now, very briefly, notice that this benediction is all along in the singular. It is not, "The Lord bless you, and keep you;" but, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee." Why? Because the people of God are one, and He views them as one; and so the blessing comes upon the entire Church as a whole. But, next, I think it is that every individual believer may take the whole of this benediction home to himself. Dear brethren, I will not call you out by name, but I would say to each brother, "The Lord bless thee." I cannot, my sisters, name you in public, though you serve the Lord so well; but I will speak to you individually, and say, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; and make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; and countenance thee, and give thee peace." The blessing is meant for the appropriation of each one. While it embraces the whole Church in one word, it yet distributes a full portion to each individual. We may each one take to himself the whole of this great benediction.

III. More I might have said upon this Old Testament benediction; but time fails me and so I must conclude, by a word or two, in the third place, upon

The Divine Amen.

The divine Amen is in the last verse: "And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel; and I will bless them." I will not attempt to preach from that little, great text—"I will bless them." I could enlarge upon it by the month. "I will bless them": they shall have their troubles; but I will bless them through their troubles. When they have earthly goods, I will bless them and make them real comforts. I will bless their basket and their store. If those earthly comforts are taken away, I will give them compensation a thousand-fold in myself. I, who gave the mercies, will allow no one but myself to take them away; and this shall only be done in love, that I may bless them still more.

Brethren the world may curse us; but if God bless us, the curse will be as the whistling wind. Friends may become enemies, or may forget us; but, if God blesses us, we can bear the wound. God blessed us when we were young, he kept us in the giddy paths of youth; he blessed us in our hale manhood, and helped us when our family cares were upon us; and He will still sus-tain us now that we lean heavily on the staff, and find the grasshopper to be a burden. He will bless us when sickness lays us low; and when we come to die Jesus will bless us with dying grace for dying moments, and hand us out our best things last. We shall wake up in the likeness of Christ, and then we shall be satisfied with His blessing, being transformed into the image of Him by whom the blessing comes. The judgment day shall dawn, the earth shall pass away, but the Lord will bless us.

How much He will bless them He does not say; but the great I who makes the promise blesses like a God. God Himself will bless His people, directly, and personally. "I will bless them." Here is absolute certainty based on the faithfulness of the Lord: here is endless mercy certified by the divine eternity and immutability. Do you whisper,

"But the Lord Sends Us Trials"?

I answer, It is true. What son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But in this is a covenant blessing; for every twig of the rod shall bring forth to them the comfortable fruits of righteousness ere many days are past. You do not need that I should say another word. Go home with this celestial music in your ears, "I will bless them."

This blessed assurance does not belong to you all indiscriminately. We have no blessing for those who are not believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. O sinners, God make you conscious that you are outside of the blessing; and may that terrible fact create in you an aching heart, and a longing soul, which nothing can ever rest but the blessing of the Lord God.

You that are resting in Jesus, hear these words, which I have read you from the inspired Book, and may the Holy Ghost write them on your minds. Thus saith Jehovah of His people, "I will bless them." The Lord has caused His servants to bless us by the testimony of the Gospel, and now He Himself blesses us by His Spirit. He will Himself bring His precious things to our door. He will Himself feast us at His table, yea, He will Himself become our food, our bread, and our water. Come, let us bless the Lord. Since He has so blessed us, let us heartily bless Him. We will wind up our meditation by singing—

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow;
Praise Him all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host;
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost!"

Building a Town in California.*

ONE day, driving along a country road about twenty miles from Los Angeles, I noticed about half-a-dozen well-dressed men resting under a tree. My companion informed me they were doubtless a syndicate looking about for a place to locate a new town. At Fullerton, a few miles from Anaheim, I saw one of these new towns. It consisted of the frame-work of a large hotel and of a few hundred yards of elegant cement sidewalk, not in front of the hotel, but in another part of the town. Elsewhere towns get pretty large before anyone begins to think of a side-walk, even of the most primitive kind; but the residents of Los Angeles County of course would not be satisfied with a side-walk in any way inferior to that in front of Mr. Vanderbilt's house on Fifth avenue, I may add that since then Fullerton has grown up into quite a little town. Having built his sidewalk and his large hotel (with real-estate office) in place of the saloon which usually is the pioneer building in Western towns, the Southern Californian begins to cast about for a supply of water; not so much for domestic use as for the irrigation of his garden and fields. If a river or brook is near by, a water company is formed, ditches are dug, and each shareholder, after paying his dues, may have his water on tap whenever he wants it. In the absence of a river, wells are made to supply the water. Sometimes these wells are bored horizontally into the mountain-side, thus making an artificial spring; but as a rule, the wells are vertical, from eighty to five hundred feet deep, or even more, although at one hundred to two hundred feet the water is generally obtained in abundance. A windmill is then erected over the well, which pumps the water into a large, high tank, whence it is easily conveyed to the garden or field by hose. There is no lack of wind to drive these mills; for the charm of Southern California's climate lies in this, that although the sky is comparatively cloudless, and the sun warm, winter and summer, there is almost always a brisk breeze to temper the solar rays, and deprive them of their sting.

In Chinatown.

San Francisco has more than twenty thousand Chinese, hence it may be imagined that Chinatown is not a village. Blocks upon blocks in some of the best streets are given over to the Asiatic invaders; and while the large buildings formerly occupied by Americans have been left standing, they have undergone such a thorough metamorphosis that if the Chinese should ever be driven from the city (as they were from Tacoma), the simplest way to Americanize these streets again would be to blow them up with dynamite and re-build them—which would also perhaps be the best way for sanitary reasons. But while the main buildings and streets have been left as originally laid out, a number of side-streets, and narrow alleys—exact copies of those in China—have been made to connect them, and fill up every vacant yard and corner; for a Chinaman is not happy unless crowded as closely as salmon in an Alaskan creek. What adds to this effect of crowding is that all life and activity seems to be concentrated on the ground-floors, no business being apparently carried on in the upper floors, which look uninhabited and empty, without window-curtains, or shutters, or sign-boards, or other signs of habitation, excepting in the restaurants, whose outsides, from base to roof, are gaily and gaudily decorated, and illuminated at night with Chinese paper lanterns. The old stores with their large rooms have been subdivided into many smaller ones—some of them only fifteen or twenty feet wide or even less. The place of sign-boards is taken by the well-known wide scrolls of red paper with Chinese characters printed on them, and pasted vertically on the street side, while smaller ones are pasted on the windows, behind which wretched female slaves may be seen at work. In the gambling-houses domino-playing seems to be the favorite game. It is different from ours, though the blocks are similar, and some of the players are as expert in mixing and placing them, and as excited and flushed as the poker-players who monopolize the smoking-room on trans-Atlantic steamers.

The Opium Dens.

We follow the guide into subterranean haunts, down several flights of rickety stairs, to get a peep at the opium dens. It is estimated that there is only one Chinaman out of every five in San Francisco who does not revel in his daily opium debauch, and even that fifth man uses it occasionally as a sedative. Some manage on ten cents' worth a day, while others need as much as a dollar's worth of a superior quality. It was the ten-cent variety we saw on this tour. The guide occasionally drops a quarter in certain places and is in return allowed free access with his party. In a dingy little room, not much larger than the stateroom of a steamer there are several bunks, in each of which lies, or sits, a Chinaman, in varying stages of stupid intoxication. Some are already asleep, others are just lighting their pipes, and not one pays the slightest attention to the intruders, unless spoken to. One helpless old wreck lies on a bundle of rags, which the guide says he has not left for five years. His hands and feet are mere bones, covered with yellow parchment, but he has still brains and strength enough left to obey the guide when requested to show us the process of opium-smoking, by holding a little lump of the drug in the flame of a small lamp, where it burns and is turned around like sealing-wax, and then stuffed into the small pipe and smoked, the fumes being inhaled through the lungs and puffed out through the nose. The only ventilation in these rat-holes is a little slit, six inches by two, above the door: yet here these Asiatics spend the whole night, the lodging being included in the price of the opium. The fear that Chinatown might become a breeding-place of bacterial epidemics leads the sanitary authorities to look well to their duties; and besides, San Francisco never has any hot waves, and its climate is in other respects unfavorable to pestilential diseases, so that Chinatown has not proved such a plague-spot as it might become under less favorable conditions.

THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON IN AFRICA.

MANY rumors have been current from early times of a range of mountains in Central Africa, which, though near the Equator, were so high as to be crowned with eternal snow. Ptolemy mentions them and there are many references to them by early travellers, who had heard of them but had never seen them. They were known as "the Mountains of the Moon." Mr. Stanley in his new book, In Darkest Africa, (published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York,) states his conviction that the Ruwenzori Mountains which he discovered (a picture of which is here given), were these much talked of mountains. This is in fact a double discovery, for Mr. Stanley adduces convincing proof that in those mountains is the true source of the Nile.

Others had traversed and surveyed the Lake Albert Nyanza, from the surface of which the snowy summits of Ruwenzori are occasionally visible, but the mountain hid itself from their gaze. This was because its deep gorges are the most gigantic factory of cloud and mist in the world. For this reason the mountain is invisible for about three hundred days out of the year, and it is quite possible that had Mr. Stanley not been compelled to stay so long on the plateau at Kavalli's, he might only have attained such rare and fugitive glimpses of the mighty mountain as would never have enabled him to realize its immense geographical importance.

The following passage from Mr. Stanley's book describes the geographical relations of the mountains to the surrounding river and lakes:—"The average European reader will perfectly understand the character of the Semliki Valley and the flanking ranges, if I were to say that its average breadth is about the distance from Dover to Calais (about 20 miles), and that in length it would cover the distance between Dover and Plymouth, or from Dunkirk to St. Malo in France. For the English side we have the Bategga Hills and rolling plateau from 3,000 feet to 3,500 feet above the valley. On the opposite side we have heights ranging from 3,000 feet to 15,000 feet above it. Now Ruwenzori occupies about 90 miles of the eastern line of mountains, and projects like an enormous bastion of an unconquerable fortress, commanding on the north-east the approaches by the Lake Albert Nyanza and Semliki Valley, and on its southern side the whole basin of the Albert Edward Lake. To a passenger on board one of the Lake Albert steamers proceeding south, this great bastion on a clear day would seem to be a range running east and west; to a traveller from the south it would appear as barring all passage north. To one looking at it from the Bategga, or western plateau, it would appear as if the slowly rising table-land of Unyoro was but the glacis of the mountain range."

"It is," says a geographical critic, "the snows of this great mountain that are the true and perennial sources of the Nile. Can we wonder that a discovery for the sake of which Julius Caesar, according to Lucan, would have abandoned the thought of empire has exercised so strange a fascination over Mr. Stanley's mind that his language in describing it becomes almost dithyrambic? Here, hidden away in the recesses of Africa, and constantly withdrawn from the gaze of men standing within range of its shadow, is the great mysterious range dimly imagined from time immemorial, and now at last shown to be a concrete scientific reality, enshrining within its midst-laden recesses the true secret of the perennial flow of the Nile, the true origin of the immemorial civilization of Egypt, and the true cause of the inexhaustible fertility of its soil."

An English Clergyman Acts as Amateur Sculptor in Re-building his Church.

MANY pastors know what it is to raise money for building a church, or re-building. It is generally a disheartening work. Some, who have encountered more than the usual obstacles, have given up in despair. It is of different stuff that a clergyman in England is made, who recently undertook the task of getting his very old church renovated. This clergyman (whose picture is here given) is the Rev. F. W. Ragg, and his church is at Marsworth, near Tring. Finding it next to impossible to raise the sum needed, and having a constitutional dislike of being defeated, he laid aside his dignity, and became his own architect, builder and stonemason. This is his history of the work:

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

"HE imposing and important letter, which Nora brought to her uncle as mentioned in the last chapter, was from Gabriel Grubb, the lawyer of Settleworth. Every one, in the children, called him "Gabriel." This all the more noteworthy for two reasons. First, he didn't look like a man who would willingly have submitted to such familiarity, second, he had been known more than once or twice to protest against it. "I don't like that Tom-Dick-and-Harry sort of notion," he would say, "It's all very well for my bosom friend (not that he ever had one), to take such a liberty; but for other people to do it is, I think, as unwarrantable as for anyone to take you by the nose." Whether this be true or not in his case, at any rate it was easier to take the liberty than to lose the nose, for Gabriel Grubb had not got any more, at least none worth speaking of. People would say—but then what is there that people will say?—that Gabriel had worn that feature of his face away by grubbing; and that as the mention of his last name always led the speaker to look at his nose, it really was a kindness to the owner both of name and nose to stop short at Gabriel.

It was noteworthy in the second place, because it was not by any means descriptive of the man. Gabriel is a good name, an exceedingly well-sounding name. It is appropriated in Scripture to one of the most elevated of created beings, and might well be supposed to have an elevating influence on those who wear it.

Gabriel Grubb was not in any way related to the archangel of that name, and it didn't seem to fit him. Hence as I have said it was noteworthy that people should so persistently choose to call him by it. I was about to introduce Gabriel Grubb to the reader, by an exact and unflattering description of his outer man, but he must wait awhile for his photograph.

"Ah!" exclaimed Abram Hardale, looking at the foot of a formidable document of blue foolscap: "it's from Gabriel Grubb."

Casting his eye over the legal penmanship, the old carpenter read the words, "The Hazle-croft Estate." With his accustomed caution, he refolded it, and put it in his pocket without a word; leaving his companions to wonder what the sly solicitor and Old Crusty, whose antipathy to lawyers was well known, could have in common.

In a little while Abram Hardale followed his niece out of the shop, after stopping a brief moment at the foot of the stairs, to listen to the merry song the young gipsy was singing, and ascended to a little chamber which he kept private, and in which his business books and small library were placed. Then he shut himself in, and set to work to study the communication he had just received from Gabriel Grubb.

"Now then, Master lawyer," said he, apostrophizing his correspondent, "let us see what little game you are inclined to play. You've a pretty good notion of the party that will come out the winner, I'll be bound, whatever it is."

He read the letter through, and re-read it, and went through it a third time; then raising his spectacles so that they rested on the middle of his brow, he threw himself back in his chair, put the tips of his fingers together, and silently pondered on the situation.

"Humph," said he at last, "I wonder if it's true. 'It'll be a grand thing for the lassie if it is. But what's your secret, Gabriel Grubb?'"

Raising his lanky form from the chair, he pocketed his spectacles, and made his way forthwith, through a side street behind the Abbey Church to a dingy office suggestive of webs, spiders, and captive flies. On the window were inscribed in equally dingy characters the words—Gabriel Grubb, Solicitor.

It was not much in prudent and cautious Abram's line to enter into a domain of that kind. Let us hope he will take particular care what he's about.

That evening, Nora, bent upon a pleasant visit to Mrs. Appleton, resolved first upon taking a long walk through Settleworth woods, which lay along the breast and brow of the Settleworth wolds. By walking some two miles in this direction, she could turn to the right through a wicket gate, and pursue her walk through a cool and shady lane—a lane much noted in the neighborhood for the song harmonies of the countless birds who nested there, and whose welfare was jealously guarded, greatly to his credit, by Squire Towneley, of Towneley Hall.

Nora was much depressed this evening, and as she sauntered across the green fields and along the woodland paths, her lonely and dependent condition seemed to come home to her with unusual force. The shameful history and the sad fate of her father over the sea, the sorrows and sufferings, the love and tenderness, which she had shared with her sainted mother; the unsympathetic character and behavior of the relative who had given her shelter and home; and a certain shadow of impending trouble for which she was unable to account, oppressed her in such a fashion, that for a long time the cheerful sights and sounds around her failed to disperse the gloom upon her mind.

She felt herself to be alone, a sort of unwelcome hanger-on. This, by-the-way, was by no means true, for there is every reason to believe that Abram Hardale congratulated himself, in his own grim fashion, on having the girl beneath his roof and by his hearth. But depressed spirits are not always—perhaps not oftenest—based on exact facts and experiences, so much as on dark fancies, self-conjured fears, and gloomy exaggerations. Half our troubles are manufactured by ourselves, and are then increased in intensity by our tendency to ponder on them.

The fear that Chinatown might become a breeding-place of bacterial epidemics leads the sanitary authorities to look well to their duties; and besides, San Francisco never has any hot waves, and its climate is in other respects unfavorable to pestilential diseases, so that Chinatown has not proved such a plague-spot as it might become under less favorable conditions.

THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON IN AFRICA.

The Ruwenzori Range of Mountains Identified by Mr. Stanley with the Mountains of the Moon.

MANY rumors have been current from early times of a range of mountains in Central Africa, which, though near the Equator, were so high as to be crowned with eternal snow. Ptolemy mentions them and there are many references to them by early travellers, who had heard of them but had never seen them. They were known as "the Mountains of the Moon." Mr. Stanley in his new book, In Darkest Africa, (published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York,) states his conviction that the Ruwenzori Mountains which he discovered (a picture of which is here given), were these much talked of mountains. This is in fact a double discovery, for Mr. Stanley adduces convincing proof that in those mountains is the true source of the Nile.

Others had traversed and surveyed the Lake Albert Nyanza, from the surface of which the snowy summits of Ruwenzori are occasionally visible, but the mountain hid itself from their gaze. This was because its deep gorges are the most gigantic factory of cloud and mist in the world. For this reason the mountain is invisible for about three hundred days out of the year, and it is quite possible that had Mr. Stanley not been compelled to stay so long on the plateau at Kavalli's, he might only have attained such rare and fugitive glimpses of the mighty mountain as would never have enabled him to realize its immense geographical importance.

The following passage from Mr. Stanley's book describes the geographical relations of the mountains to the surrounding river and lakes:—"The average European reader will perfectly understand the character of the Semliki Valley and the flanking ranges, if I were to say that its average breadth is about the distance from Dover to Calais (about 20 miles), and that in length it would cover the distance between Dover and Plymouth, or from Dunkirk to St. Malo in France. For the English side we have the Bategga Hills and rolling plateau from 3,000 feet to 3,500 feet above the valley. On the opposite side we have heights ranging from 3,000 feet to 15,000 feet above it. Now Ruwenzori occupies about 90 miles of the eastern line of mountains, and projects like an enormous bastion of an unconquerable fortress, commanding on the north-east the approaches by the Lake Albert Nyanza and Semliki Valley, and on its southern side the whole basin of the Albert Edward Lake. To a passenger on board one of the Lake Albert steamers proceeding south, this great bastion on a clear day would seem to be a range running east and west; to a traveller from the south it would appear as barring all passage north. To one looking at it from the Bategga, or western plateau, it would appear as if the slowly rising table-land of Unyoro was but the glacis of the mountain range."

"It is," says a geographical critic, "the snows of this great mountain that are the true and perennial sources of the Nile. Can we wonder that a discovery for the sake of which Julius Caesar, according to Lucan, would have abandoned the thought of empire has exercised so strange a fascination over Mr. Stanley's mind that his language in describing it becomes almost dithyrambic? Here, hidden away in the recesses of Africa, and constantly withdrawn from the gaze of men standing within range of its shadow, is the great mysterious range dimly imagined from time immemorial, and now at last shown to be a concrete scientific reality, enshrining within its midst-laden recesses the true secret of the perennial flow of the Nile, the true origin of the immemorial civilization of Egypt, and the true cause of the inexhaustible fertility of its soil."

A VICAR HIS OWN SCULPTOR.

An English Clergyman Acts as Amateur Sculptor in Re-building his Church.

MANY pastors know what it is to raise money for building a church, or re-building. It is generally a disheartening work. Some, who have encountered more than the usual obstacles, have given up in despair. It is of different stuff that a clergyman in England is made, who recently undertook the task of getting his very old church renovated. This clergyman (whose picture is here given) is the Rev. F. W. Ragg, and his church is at Marsworth, near Tring. Finding it next to impossible to raise the sum needed, and having a constitutional dislike of being defeated, he laid aside his dignity, and became his own architect, builder and stonemason. This is his history of the work:

the church," he writes "had ill-treated by contract before 1857, and was need-pair all through. The raised with difficulty, too small to admit of the yment of architect or r. OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.
BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

"THE imposing and important letter, which Nora brought to her uncle as mentioned in the last chapter, was from Gabriel Grubb, the lawyer of Settleworth. Every one, in the children, called him "Gabriel." This is all the more noteworthy for two reasons. First, he didn't look like a man who would willingly have submitted to such familiarity, second, he had been known more than once or twice to protest against it. "I don't like that Tom-Dick-and-Harry sort of notion," he would say, "It's all very well for our bosom friend (not that he ever had one), to take such a liberty; but for other people to do it is, I think, as unwarrantable as for anyone to take you by the nose." Whether this be true or not in his case, at any rate it was easier to take the liberty than to give it, for Gabriel Grubb had not got any more, at least none worth speaking of. People would say—but then what is there that people will say?—that Gabriel had worn that feature of his face away by grubbing; and that as the mention of his last name always led the speaker to look at his nose, it really was a kindness to the owner both of name and nose to stop short at Gabriel.

It was noteworthy in the second place, because it was not by any means descriptive of the man. Gabriel is a good name, an exceedingly well-sounding name. It is appropriated in Scripture to one of the most elevated of created beings, and might well be supposed to have an elevating influence on those who wear it.

Gabriel Grubb was not in any way related to the archangel of that name, and it didn't seem to fit him. Hence as I have said it was noteworthy that people should so persistently choose to call him by it. I was about to introduce Gabriel Grubb to the reader, by an exact and unflattering description of his outer man, but he must wait awhile for his photograph.

"Ah!" exclaimed Abram Hardale, looking at the foot of a formidable document of blue foolscap: "it's from Gabriel Grubb."

Casting his eye over the legal penmanship, the old carpenter read the words, "The Hazel-croft Estate." With his accustomed caution, he refolded it, and put it in his pocket without a word; leaving his companions to wonder what the sly solicitor and Old Crusty, whose antipathy to lawyers was well known, could have in common.

In a little while Abram Hardale followed his niece out of the shop, after stopping a brief moment at the foot of the stairs, to listen to the merry song the young gipsy was singing, and ascended to a little chamber which he kept private, and in which his business books and small library were placed. Then he shut himself in, and set to work to study the communication he had just received from Gabriel Grubb.

"Now then, Master lawyer," said he, apostrophizing his correspondent, "let us see what little game you are inclined to play. You've a pretty good notion of the party that will come out the winner, I'll be bound, whatever it is."

He read the letter through, and re-read it, and went through it a third time; then raising his spectacles so that they rested on the middle of his brow, he threw himself back in his chair, put the tips of his fingers together, and silently pondered on the situation.

"Humph," said he at last, "I wonder if it's true. 'It'll be a grand thing for the lassie if it is. But what's your secret, Gabriel Grubb?'"

Raising his lanky form from the chair, he pocketed his spectacles, and made his way forthwith, through a side street behind the Abbey Church to a dingy office suggestive of webs, spiders, and captive flies. On the window were inscribed in equally dingy characters the words—Gabriel Grubb, Solicitor.

It was not much in prudent and cautious Abram's line to enter into a domain of that kind. Let us hope he will take particular care what he's about.

That evening, Nora, bent upon a pleasant visit to Mrs. Appleton, resolved first upon taking a long walk through Settleworth woods, which lay along the breast and brow of the Settleworth wolds. By walking some two miles in this direction, she could turn to the right through a wicket gate, and pursue her walk through a cool and shady lane—a lane much noted in the neighborhood for the song harmonies of the countless birds who nested there, and whose welfare was jealously guarded, greatly to his credit, by Squire Towneley, of Towneley Hall.

Nora was much depressed this evening, and as she sauntered across the green fields and along the woodland paths, her lonely and dependent condition seemed to come home to her with unusual force. The shameful history and the sad fate of her father over the sea, the sorrows and sufferings, the love and tenderness which she had shared with her sainted mother; the unsympathetic character and behavior of the relative who had given her shelter and home; and a certain shadow of impending trouble for which she was unable to account, oppressed her in such a fashion, that for a long time the cheerful sights and sounds around her failed to disperse the gloom upon her mind.

She felt herself to be alone, a sort of unwelcome hanger-on. This, by-the-way, was by no means true, for there is every reason to believe that Abram Hardale congratulated himself, in his own grim fashion, on having the girl beneath his roof and by his hearth. But depressed spirits are not always—perhaps not often—based on exact facts and experiences, so much as on dark fancies, self-conjured fears, and gloomy exaggerations. Half our troubles are manufactured by ourselves, and are then increased in intensity by our tendency to ponder on them.

Coming at length to a lovely glade, through which flowed a sparkling stream on its way to join the Settle, and crossing a rustic bridge, Nora stood and leaned her elbows on the rude rail that formed a part of it.

She gave herself up to melancholy musings; and the tinkle of the stream, and even the chirping of the birds among the bushes that fringed the brook, and the willows that overhung it, seemed to her to make a minor music in accord with her frame of mind. As her eyes were fixed on the flowing waters, she murmured aloud the words of Longfellow's poem, putting the words in the present tense, as if more greedily to appropriate them to herself:

"How often, oh how often,
I could wish the ebbing tide
Would bear me away on its bosom,
O'er the ocean wild and wide;
For my heart is hot and restless,
And my life is full of care,
And the burden laid upon me
Seems greater than I can bear."

Then the tears flowed freely, and she breathed a silent prayer to heaven for the promised grace to help her in time of need. And now, as aforesaid, she proved the truth of the ancient tender rhyme:

"For the orphan's tear, the orphan's cry,
God ever hath an ear, an eye;
And sendeth angels down to bless
The sad hearts of the fatherless."

In this case the angel had the wings and throat of a missel-thrush, which just at that moment piped a brief voluntary, and then straightway sang its vesper song, pouring a full flood of melody from overhead, so that it fell on the sad heart of the girl like a benediction from heaven. Looking upward—hers, you see, had been till then a downward look, such is the foolish way we have of wooing the sadness against which we should contend—she saw the chorister, perched on the topmost branch of a tall, silver birch, whose lace-like foliage was gleaming and shimmering in the glorious light of the setting sun.

Nora had failed to take note of time. The bird-song had held her beneath its spell longer than she thought. When she had passed through the wicket-gate, and entered the deeper shadows of the grove, she was a little alarmed to find herself so far from her intended goal at so late an hour. She determined therefore, to give up her design of visiting Mrs. Appleton and turned her steps homeward. She made what haste she could so as to reach the light again which still shone in the open. Before she reached the second gate she was met by no less important individual than Gerald Towneley, Esq., who was sauntering much at his ease, and who, bowing with an air that Beau Brummel might have envied, said, "Good evening, Miss."

It is not to be supposed that our young patrician was transgressing established rules of etiquette in addressing a lady whom he did not know, and to whom he had not been introduced. That rule was, of course, to be observed on all fitting occasions, and by all who could claim eligibility in the matter of rank; but Nora was only the niece of a country carpenter, and in such a case one need not be too particular about attending to the courtesies of well-bred life. Nora, who was a lady, though she did live next door to a carpenter's shop, politely responded.

"Good evening;" and quietly passed on.

"I'm sure you will excuse me, Miss; but I think I had the pleasure of seeing you at Old--ah'm--Abram Hardale's place the other day. I'm afraid you would think me dreadfully rude on that occasion, but the truth is I was so thoroughly taken by surprise, ah—lost in astonishment at the remarkable vision—"

"Oh, I beg to assure you there's not the slightest need for an apology," said Nora, with a most uncomfortable blush on either cheek, "I did not—I do not remember anything about it." So saying, she bowed, and with some additional speed resumed her homeward way. Mr. Gerald, however, was not likely to be shaken off. Putting a wonderful amount of tenderness in his tone, so that even his moustache appeared to droop under the intensity of his feeling, he said, as he turned to walk by her side,

"I'm glad to hear it, my dear young lady. I assure you it has distressed me very much. I have not been able to get the charming damsel that I saw in Hardale's doorway out of my mind, and I have been longing for an opportunity to make acquaintance with—"

"I am sure, sir, that you will see," said Nora, with much dignity, though for the life of her she could not help the blood mantling in her gipsy cheek, "that I cannot linger here, and must ask you to leave me to make my way home," and again she set off to walk faster than before.

"Well, good evening, then; but I hope you will not deny me an opportunity of telling you what is in my heart: I do assure you I never was in such earnest in my life. Shake hands with me to show that you quite forgive my intrusion;" and Gerald Towneley, Esq., extended his lavender glove for that purpose.

"Good evening, Miss Nora; shall I see you home?" said George Appleton, and between the gloved hand and the agitated girl there stood the stalwart form of Old Crusty's foreman, with white apron folded around his waist, and the semi-circular bag of tools, from which the blade of the hand-saw was peeping, slung across his shoulder and carried by the aid of his adze.

"What do you mean?" said the young gentleman, with a frown on his face and anger in his eye, and half lifting his cane in threatening fashion.

"I mean to take care of Miss Mansford," said George, coolly, and yet in such a fashion as to forcibly intimate his opinion of the young squireen, "if she will permit me that honor, and to bid you good-night."

Nora had taken advantage of this little episode to prosecute her journey; and as she was now far ahead, and George Appleton looked a trifle dangerous, the baffled exquisite contented himself with saying:

"Look you here, Mr. Carpenter, don't you interfere with matters that don't concern you. I can soon put a spoke in your wheel, so take care."

"I'm afraid there's no need to put a nave in yours; and I mean to be on the watch as to how you turn; so there," said George in reply.

It required all George Appleton's superior strength and length of limb to lessen the distance between himself and the young lady. The fact is that Nora, though she was sufficiently thankful for George's timely appearance, had been so impressed with the unwisdom of being in that neighborhood at all at such an hour that she was anxious to escape companionship altogether.

She passed the gate of the Hermitage at a half run without noticing that its new occupant was standing, leaning on the gate, and enjoying the coolness of the evening air. He, however, was a remarkably observant character, and Nora's haste convinced him that fear of something behind, or apprehension of something in store was lending wings to her feet, and giving color to her face.

Those keen, though kindly grey eyes of his, belonged to one who was much in the habit of studying human nature. Still thinking of the flurried maiden, whom he had recognized, he saw the carpenter's foreman pass the gate at a pace which didn't comport very well with the close of a hard day's toil, and the carrying of a heavy bag of tools.

His grey eyes twinkled with additional interest now as he said to himself: "Ah ah, Master Carpenter; you're finding the truth of the old saying, I imagine, 'A stern chase is a long chase;' but is it a fair chase, I wonder. I must find that out. The lad's face is honest enough and gives evidence of mind. If I were a girl I should deem it handsome compared with the empty prettiness of that vacuous squireen—but I'll see."

THE PATH FOR MY FEET.

I CAST a backward glance down life's rough road O'er which my weary, earth-worn feet have trod;
And, 'midst the dark, I see the pathway strewn
With priceless blessings from the hand of God.

What though sharp piercing thorns infest
my path;
Are there not here and there some rare,
sweet flowers?
God sends us good and ill in love—not wrath;
We need some bitter in this life of ours.

Are shadows falling? There is light above.
Do storms descend? The sun will smile again.

And so I recognize the hand of Love That guides me gently through a life of pain.

'Tis not all darkness. Some soft golden rays
Have shed their radiance o'er my darkened life.

And though I wander now through troubled ways,
Their memory comes like blessing after strife.

So I accept whate'er my Father wills,
Since He designs it for my highest good;
For what to our weak sight are seeming ills,
Are richest blessings if but understood.

God has been good to me. I cannot ask For richer mercies than His love has given,
Until my soul is freed, and I shall bask
In the broad sunshine of His perfect Heaven.

O All Wise Father, I will not disown
The love which sends the bitter with the sweet,
Nor will I murmur though I walk alone
The path Thou hast appointed for my feet.

"Stepping Stones."

Your special attention is called to this new "Silent Comforter," just published by the undersigned. Unlike others that have been published, it is not exclusively made up of Scripture texts. Its novelty is in the quotations taken from the rich field of general literature. It contains 35 sheets, each having a subject, such as "Temptation," "Love," "Growth," etc. A Scripture text is the first quotation, then follows selections from a wide variety of authors to illuminate the subject. Each seventh leaf is a little sermon by a noted preacher. This Wall Scroll is handsomely printed and mounted. Single copies $1.00, post paid; Six for $5.00.

OUR SAIL ON LAKE GALILEE.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" SERVICE LAST SUNDAY, NOV. 30, 1890.

A Pearl Among Lakes—Its Many Names—The Embarkation—The Cities on Its Banks—The Contrasted Characters of the Lake Region—The Cemetery of the Possessed Swine—The Battle of the Cages and the Caves—A Sudden Storm—A Christ for Rough Weather—The Landing at Capernaum—The Home of Chuza—The Restoration of the Child—Lincoln Praying for Wisdom—A Centre of Civilization—The World to be Won Through the Cities.

"He entered into a ship and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land." Mark 4: 1.

IT is Monday morning in our Palestine experiences, and the sky is a blue Galilee above, as in the boat we sail the blue Galilee beneath. It is thirteen miles long and six miles wide, but the atmosphere is so clear it seems as if I could cast a stone from beach to beach. The lake looks as though it had been let down on silver pulleys from the heavens and were a section of the sea of glass that St. John describes as a part of the celestial landscape. Lake Galilee is a depression of six hundred feet in which the river Jordan widens and tarries a little, for the river Jordan comes in at its north side and departs from its south side, so this lake has its cradle and its grave. Its white satin cradle is among the snows of Mount Hermon where the Jordan starts, and its sepulchre is the Dead Sea into which the Jordan empties. Lake Como of Italy, Lake Geneva of Switzerland, Lake Lomond of Scotland, Lake Winnepesaukee of America, are larger, but Lake Galilee is the greatest diamond that ever dropped from the finger of the clouds, and, whether encamped on its banks as we were yesterday and worshipping at its crystal altars, or wading into its waves which make an ordinary bath solemn as a baptism, or now putting out upon its sparkling surface in a boat, it is something to talk about, and pray about, and sing about, until the lips with which we now describe it can neither talk, nor pray, nor sing.

As sometimes a beautiful child in a neighborhood has a half-dozen pet names, and some of the neighbors call her by one name, and others by another, so this pet lake of the planet has a profusion of names. Ask the Arab as he goes by, what this sheet of water is, and he will call it Tabariyeh. Ask Moses of the Old Testament and he calls it Sea of Chinnereth. Ask Matthew and he calls it Sea of Galilee. Ask Luke and he calls it Sea of Gennesaret. Ask John and he calls it Sea of Tiberias. Ask Josephus and Eusebius, and they have other names ready. But to me it appears a child of the sky, a star of the hills, a rhapsody of the mountains, the baptismal bowl of the world's temple, the smile of the great God. Many kinds of fish are found in these waters, every kind of tree upon its bank, from those that grow in the torrid zone to those in the frigid, from the palm to the cedar,

Of the two hundred and thirty war-ships Josephus manœuvred on these waters—for Josephus was a warrior as well as a historian—there remains not one piece of a hulk, or one patch of a canvas, or one splinter of an oar. But return to America we never will until we have had a sail upon this inland sea. Not from a wharf but from a beach covered with black and white pebbles we go on board a boat of about ten or twelve tons, to be propelled partly by sail and partly by oars. The mast leans so far forward that it seems about to fall, but we find it was purposely so built, and the rope through a pulley manages to hoist and let down the sail. It is a rough boat and as far as possible removed from a Venetian gondola or a sportsman's yacht. With a common saw and hammer and axe many of you could make a better one. Four bare-footed Arabs, instead of sitting down to their oars, stand as they always do in rowing, and pull away from shore. I insist on helping, for there is nothing more exhilarating to me than rowing, but I soon had enough of the clumsy excesses, and Pliny and Josephus describe the spurtings out of these volcanic heats, and Joshua and Moses knew about them, and at that moment long lines of pilgrims from all parts of the earth are waiting for their turn to step in the steaming restoratives. Let the boat, as far as possible, and not run aground, hug the western shore of the lake that we may see the city of Tiberias, once a great capital, of the architecture which a few mosaics, and fallen pillars and pedestals, and here and there a broken and shattered frieze remain, mightily suggestive of the time when Herod Antipas had a palace here and reigned with an opulence, and pomp, and cruelty, and abomination that paralyzes the fingers of the historian when he comes to write it, and the fingers of the painter when he attempts to transfer it to canvas. I suppose that was one of the worst men that ever lived. At what a contrast of character comes at every moment to the thoughtful traveller in Palestine whether he walks the beach of this lake or sails in a boat as we now do on these waters!

Side by side are the two great characters of this lake region: Jesus and Herod Antipas. And did any age produce any such antipodes, any such antitheses, any such opposites, Kindness and Cruelty, Holiness and Filth, Generosity and Meanness, Self-sacrifice and Selfishness, the Supernatural and the Infernal, Midnight and Midday, the fathoms of this Herod Antipas was a genius at assassination. He could manufacture more reasons for putting people out of this life than a man in all history. He sends for Hyrcanus to come from Babylon to Jerusalem to be made High Priest and slays him. He kills his brother-in-law while in the bath with him drowned by the king's attendants. He slays his wife and his wife's mother, and two of his sons and his uncle, and filled his volume of atrocities.

AN ANCIENT TOMB IN JERUSALEM.

oars, and the awkward attempt at wielding them while in standing posture.

We put our overcoats and shawls on a small deck in the stern of the boat, the very kind of a deck where Christ lay on a fisherman's coat, when of old a tempest pounced upon the fishing smack of the affrighted disciples. Ospreys and wild duck and kingfishers fly overhead or dip their wings into the lake, mistaking it for a fragment of fallen sky. Can it be that those Bible stories about sudden storms on this lake are true? Is it possible that a sea of such seeming placidity of temper could ever rise and rage at the heavens? It does not seem as if this happy family of elements could have ever had a falling out and the water strike at the clouds and the clouds strike at the water.

Pull away, oarsmen! On our right bank are the hot sulphur baths, so hot they are scalding, and the waters must cool off a long while before hand or foot can endure their temperature. Volcanoes have been boiling these waters for centuries. Four springs roll their resources into two great swimming reservoirs. King Herod there tried to bathe off the results of his ities, the last chapter of which was the massacre of all the babes at Bethlehem. With such a father as Herod the Great, you are not surprised that this Herod Antipas, whose palace stood on the banks of this lake we now see was a combination of wolf, reptile and hyena. While the Christ who walked yonder bank and sailed these waters was so good that almost every rood of this scenery is associated with some wise word or some kindly deed, and literature, and all art, and all earth, and heaven are put to the utmost effort in trying to express how grand and glorious and lovely was, and is, and is to be. The Christly and Herodic characters as different as the two lakes we visit and not far apart, Galilee and the Dead Sea; the one flower-banked and the other bituminous and blasted; the one hovered over by the Mercy of Christ, the other blasted by the wrath of God; the one full of finny tribes sporting in the clear depths, the other forever lifeless; the waters of the one sweet and pleasant to the taste, the other bitter and disgusting. Awful Dead Sea! Glorious Gennesaret!

We will not attempt to cross to the eastern of this lake, as I had thought to do, for those lions are inhabited by a thieving and murder- race, and one must go thoroughly armed, as I never shot anyone and have no ambi- to be shot, I said: "Let us stay by the west- shore." But we look over to the hills of Lara, on the other side, down which two usand swine after being possessed by the il ran into the lake, and bringing down on ist for permitting it the wrath of all the k-raisers of that country, because of this ing of the pork business. You see that n is a spirit of bad taste. Why did he not : "Let me go into those birds, whole flocks hich fly over Galilee." No: that would e been too high. "Why not let me go into sheep which nder over these ?" No, that d have been gentle. "Rath- et me go into e swine. I t to be with : denizens of mire. I want associate with inhabitants of filth. Great is d! I prefer stles to wings. ould rather t than fly. I snout better n wing."

nfidelity scoffs at the idea that those swine uld have run into the lake. But it was e natural that under the heat and burning hat demoniac possession, they would start the water to get cooled off. Would that all swine thus possessed had plunged to the e drowning, for to this day the descendants me of those porcine creatures retain the de- ns, and as the devils were cast out of man y them, they now afflict the human race with devils of scrofula that comes from eating unclean meat. The healthiest people on th are the Israelites because they follow bill of fare which God in the book of Leviti- gave to the human race, and our splendid nch Doctor Pasteur, and our glorious Ger- n Doctor Koch, may go on with their good rk of killing parasites in the human system; until the world corrects its diet, and goes k to the Divine regulation at the beginning, human race will continue to be possessed the devils of microbe and parasite. But I not mean to cross over to the eastern side Lake Galilee even in discussion.

ull away, ye Arab oarsmen! And we come ng the shore near by which stand great ipices of brown, and red, and grey lime- ne crowned by basalt, in the sides of which vast caverns, sometimes the hiding-place of dits, and sometimes the home of honest shep- ds and sometimes the dwelling-place of eons, and vultures, and eagles. During one of od's wars his enemies hid in these mountain rns and the sides were too steep for Herod's y to descend, and the attempt to climb in face of armed men would have called down ermination. So Herod had great cages wood, iron-bound, made and filled them h soldiers and let them down from the top the precipices until they gave signal that y were level with the caverns, and then from e cages they stepped out to the mouth of the rns and having set-enough grass and wood ire to fill the caverns with smoke and ocation, the hidden people would come th to die; and if not coming forth voluntar- Herod's men would pull them out with long h hooks, and Josephus says that one father ier than submit to the attacking army, flung wife and seven children down the precipice, d then leaped after them to his own death. Now, ye Arab oarsmen, row on with swifter oke, for we want before noon to land at pernaum, the three-years' home of Jesus,

THE MASSACRE OF THE BÂBES.

But before arrival there we are to have a new experience. The lake that had been a smooth surface begins to break up into roughness. The air which all the morning made our sail almost useless, suddenly takes hold of our boat with a grip astonishing, and our poor craft be- gins to roll and pitch, and tumble, and in five minutes we pass from a calm to violence. The contour of this lake among the hills is an invita- tion to hurricanes. I used to wonder why it was that on so limited a sheet of water a be- stormed boat in Christ's time, did not put back to shore, when a hurricane was coming. I won- der no more. On that lake an atmospheric fury gives no warning, and the change we saw in five minutes made me feel that the boat in which Christ sailed may have been skillfully managed, when and the importunate cry went up: "Lord save us or we perish!" I had all along that morning been reading from the New Testament the story of occurrences on, and around that lake. But our Bible was closed now, and it was as much as we could do to hold fast, and wish for the land. If the winds and the waves had continued to in- crease in violence the following fifteen minutes in the same ratio, as in the first five, and we had been still at their mercy, our bones would have been bleaching at the bottom of Lake Gennesaret instead of our being here to tell the story. But the same Power that rescued the fishermen of old, to-day safely landed our party. What a Christ for rough weather! All the sailor boys ought to fly to him as did those Galilean mariners. All you in the forecandle, and all you who run up and down the slippery rat- lines, take to sea with you him who with a quiet word sent the winds back through the mount- ain gorges. Some of you Jack Tars to whom these words will come need to "tack ship" and change your course if you are going to get across this sea of life safely, and gain the heav- enly harbor. Belay there. Ready about! Helm's a-lee! Mainsail haul! You have too valuable a cargo on board to run into the Good- wins or the Skerries.

"Star of peace! beam o'er the billow,
Bless the soul that sighs for thee;
Bless the sailor's lonely pillow,
Far, far at sea."

Here at Capernaum, the Arabs having in their arms carried us ashore to the only place where our Lord ever had a pastorate, and we stepped amid the ruins of the church, where he preach- ed again, and again, and again, the synagogue, whose rich sculpturing lay there, not as when others see it in spring-time covered with weeds,

BATTLE WITH CAVE ROBBERS.
and loathsome with reptiles, but in that December weather completely uncovered to our agitated and intense gaze. On one stone of that synagogue is the sculpturing of a pot of manna, an artistic commem- oration of the time when the Israelites were fed by manna in the wilderness, and to which sculpturing no doubt, Christ pointed upward, while he was preaching that sermon on this very spot, in which he said: "Not as your fathers did eat manna and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live forever." Wonderful Capernaum. Scene of more miracles than any place in all the earth! Blind eyes kindling with the morning. Withered arms made to pulsate. Lepers blooming into health. The dead girl reanimated.

These Arab tents which on this December day I find in Palestine, disappear and I see Capernaum as it was when Jesus was pastor of the church here. Look at that wealthy home, the architecture, the marble front, the upholstery, the slaves in uniform at the doorway. It is the residence of a courtier of Herod, probably Chuza by name, his wife Joanna, a Christian disci- ple. But something is the matter. The slaves are in great excitement, and the courtier living there runs down the front steps and takes a horse and puts him at full run across the country. The boy of that nobleman is dying of typhoid fever. All the doctors have failed to give relief. But about five miles up the country, at Cana, there is a Divine Doctor, Jesus by name, and the agonized father has gone for him, and with what earnestness those can un- derstand who have had a dying child in the house. This courtier cries to Christ: "Come down ere my child die!"

While the father is absent, and at one o'clock in the afternoon, the people watching the dying boy see a change in the countenance, and Joanna, the mother, on one side of his couch says: "Why, this darling is getting well; the fever has broken; see the perspiration on his forehead; did any of you give him any new kind of medicine?" "No," is the answer. The boy turns on his pillow, his delirium gone, and

RECOVERY OF CHUZA'S SON. one o'clock. Then they start out and meet the returning father, and as soon as they come within speaking distance they shout at the top of their voices: "Your boy is getting well." "Is it possible?" says the father, "When did the change for the better take place?" "One o'clock" is the answer. "Why," says the courtier, "that is just the hour that Jesus said to me 'Thy son liveth.' One o'clock!"

That Home at Capernaum!
The affectionate mother, Joanna, has not had sleep for many nights and she now falls off into delightful slumber. The father, Chuza, the Herodian courtier, worn out with anxiety as well as by the rapid journey to and from Cana, is soon in restful-unconsciousness. Joanna was a Christian before, but I warrant she was more of a Christian afterward. Did the father Chuza accept the Christ who had cured his boy? Is there in all the earth a parent so ungrateful for the convalescence or restoration of an im- perilled child as not to go into a room and kneel down and make surrender to the Almighty love that came to the rescue.

Do not mix up this case with the angry dis- cussions about Christian science, but accept the doctrine, as old as the Bible, that God does answer prayer for the sick. That Capernaum boy was not the only illustration of the fact that prayer is mightier than a typhoid fever. And there is not a doctor of large practice but has come into the sick-room of some hopeless case and, in a cheerful manner, if he were a Chris- tian, or with a bewildered manner if he were a sceptic, said: "Well, what have you been doing with this patient? What have you been giving him? The pulse is better. The crisis is past. After all, I think he will get well." Prayer will yet be acknowledged in the world's materia medica and the cry is just as appropriate now as when Chuza, the courtier from Capernaum, uttered in Christ's hearing: "Come down ere my child die!" If the prayer be not answered in the way we wish, it is because God has something better for the child than earthly recovery, and there are thousands of men and women now alive in answer to fathers' and mothers' prayers, myself one of the multitude. For I have heard my parents tell how when at three years of age scarlet fever seemed to have done its full work on me and the physicians had said there was no more use of their coming and they had left a few simple directions to make the remaining hours peaceful, and according to the custom in those times in country places, the neighbors had already come in and made the shroud, the forlorn case suddenly brightened and the prayer "Come down ere my child die!" was answered in a recovery that has not been followed by a moment's sickness from that time to this.

The mightiest agency in the universe is prayer and it turns even the Almighty. It decides the destinies of individuals, families and nations. During our sad civil war a gentleman was a guest at the White House in Washington and he gives this incident. He says: "I had been spending three weeks in the White House with Mr. Lincoln, as his guest. One night—it was just after the battle of Bull Run—I was restless and could not sleep. I was repeating the part which I was to take in a public performance. The hour was past midnight. Indeed, it was coming near to the dawn when I heard low tones proceeding from a private room where the President slept. The door was partly open. I instinctively walked in and there I saw a sight which I shall never forget. It was the President kneeling before an open Bible. The light was turned low in the room. His back was turned toward me; for a moment I was silent as I stood looking in amazement and wonder. Then he cried out in tones so pitiful and sorrowful: 'Oh thou God that heard Solomon in the night when he prayed for wisdom, hear me! I cannot lead this people, I cannot guide the affairs of this nation without thy help. I am poor and weak and sinful. O God, who didst hear Solomon when he cried for wisdom, hear me and save the nation!'" You see we don't need to go back to Bible times for evidence that prayer is heard and answered.

But some one may say that Christ at Capernaum healed that courtier's child, yet he would not have done it, for one in humble life. Why, in that very Capernaum, He did the same thing for a dying slave, belonging to the man who had made a present to the town of the synagogue among whose ruins, I leaped from fragment to fragment. This was the cure of a Roman soldier's slave, whose only acknowledged rights were the wishes of his owner. And none are now so enslaved or so humble or sick or so sinful, but the all-sympathetic Christ is ready to help them. Hear it! Pardon for all. Mercy for all. Help for all. Comfort for all. Heaven for all. Oh, this Lake Galilee! What a refreshment for Christ it must have been after sympathizing with the sick, and raising the dead, and preaching to the multitudes all day long, to come down on these banks in the night-time and feel the cool air of the sea on his hot face, and look up to the stars the lighted lamps around the Heavenly Palaces from which he had descended.

All heaven and earth were still: from the high host of stars to the hilled lake and mountain coast.

All heaven and earth were still—though not in sleep, But breathless, as we grow when feeling most

"But," says some one, "why was it that Christ coming to save the world should spend so much of his time on, and around so solitary a place as Lake Galilee? There is only one city of any size on its beach, and both the western and eastern shores are a solitude, broken only by the sounds coming from the mud hovels of the degraded. Why did not Christ begin at Babylon the mighty, at Athens the learned, at Cairo the historic, at Thebes the hundred-gated, at Rome the triumphant? If Christ was going to save the world, why not go where the world's people dwell? Would a man, wishing to revolutionize for good the American continent, pass his time amid the fishing-huts on the shores of Newfoundland?" My friends, Galilee was the hub of the wheel of civilization, and art, and the centre of a population that staggers realization. On the shore of the lake we sail to-day, stood nine great cities, Scythopolis, Tarichæ, Hippos, Gamala, Chorazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Magdala, Tiberias—and many villages the smallest of which had circling Lake Galilee was the metropolis of our planet. It was to the very heart of the world that Jesus came to soothe its sorrows, and pardon its sins, and heal its sick, and emancipate its enslaved and reanimate its dead.

And let the Church and the world take this suggestion. While the solitary places are not to be neglected, we must strike for the great cities, if this world is ever to be taken for Christ. Evangelize all the earth except the cities, and one year the cities would corrupt the earth. But bring the cities, and all the world will come. Bring London and England will come. Bring Paris and France will come. Bring Berlin and Germany will come. Bring St. Petersburg and Russia will come. Bring Vienna and Austria will come. Bring Cairo and Egypt will come. Bring the near three million people in this cluster of cities on the Atlantic coast, and all America will soon see the salvation of God. Ministers of religion! let us intensify our evangelism. Editors and publishers! purify your printing presses! Asylums of mercy enlarge your plans of endeavor. And instead of this absurd belittling and wicked rivalry among our cities as to who happens to have the most men and women and children, not realizing that the more useless and bad people a city has the worse it is off, and that a city which has ten thousand good people is more to be admired than a city with one hundred thousand bad people, let us take a moral census, and see how many good men and good women are leading forth how large a generation of good children who will consecrate themselves to holiness and to God. Oh thou blessed Christ who didst come to the mighty cities encircling Lake Galilee! come in mercy all our great cities of to-day. Thou who didst put thy hand to the white mane of the foaming billows of Gennesaret, and make them lie down at thy feet, hush all the raging passions of this world! Oh thou blessed Christ who on the night when the disciples were trying to cross the lake and "the wind was contrary," after nine hours of rowing had made only three miles didst come stepping on water that at the touch of thy foot hardened into crystal, meet our shipping whether on placid or stormy seas, and say to all the people now by whatever storm of tempest tossed or driven, thou didst to the drenched disciples in the cyclone, "Be of good cheer. I am here. Be not afraid!"

Thank God that I have seen this Lake Galilee in my Christly memories, and I can say with Robert McCheyne, the ascended minister of Scotland who, seated on the banks of this lake, wrote in his last, sick days, and just before He crossed the Jordan, not the Jordan that empties into the Galilee, but the Jordan that empties into the "Sea of Glass mingled with fire;" these sweet words fit to be played by human fingers on strung strings of earthly lute, or by angel fingers on seraphic harps:

It is not that the wild gazelle
Comes down to drink thy tide,
But He that was pierced to save from hell,
Oft wandered by thy side.
Graceful around thee the mountains meet,
Thou calm, reposing sea;
But ah! far more, the beautiful feet
Of Jesus walked o'er thee.
O Saviour! gone to God's right hand.
Yet the same Saviour still,
Graved on thy heart is this lovely strand,
And every fragrant hill.

THE RUINS OF CAPERNAUM.

(From a photograph brought from the Holy Land by Dr. Talmage.)

15,000 inhabitants, according to Josephus, and reaching from the beach back into the country in all directions. Palaces, temples, coliseums, gymnasiums, amphitheatres, towers, gardens terraced on the hillsides, fountains bewildering with sunlight, baths upon whose mosaic floors kings trod; while this lake from where the Jordan enters it to where the Jordan leaves it, was beautiful with all styles of shallop, or dreadful with all kinds of war galleon. Four thousand ships, history says, were at one time upon these waters. Battles were fought there, which shocked all nations with their consequences.

Here mingling blood with pure and sparkling foam, In her last throes Judæa fought with Rome. Upon those sea-fights looked Vespasian, and Titus, and Trajan, and whole empires. From one of these naval encounters so many of the dead floated to the beach, they could not soon enough be entombed, and a plague was threatened. Twelve hundred soldiers escaping from these vessels of war were one day massacred in the amphitheatre at Tiberias. For three hundred years that almost continuous city en-

THE CHURCH OF THE COVENANT.

A CHURCH with interesting associations is that of "The Covenant," in Washington, D. C., pictures of the exterior and interior which, with a portrait of its pastor, appear the first page of this journal, this week. The church might appropriately be called at this time "the Church of the Administration," for numbers among its communicants more members of the Cabinet and leading statesmen are usually found in one Church during a presidential term. President Harrison is a member, and so are Secretary of State Blaine, Secretary Windom, Postmaster-General Wanmaker, and Senators Cullom, Hale, Dawes, and Millan. Among other distinguished members pew-holders are: General McCook, Admirals Alhoun and Carter, General H. W. Boynton, Samuel Shellabarger, and James E. Fitch. The church building is one of the most recent of Washington's ecclesiastical edifices. It was opened for religious services on February 1, 1889. There were more than a hundred churches already in Washington before it was built, but the need of a Presbyterian Church, in their own neighborhood, was felt by a large number of persons living in the north-western section of the city. Accordingly, in 1883, some twenty gentlemen met at the house of ex-Justice Strong and formed a church organization. They immediately took steps to secure a suitable site for a building. Among them were Mr. Blaine, the late Justice Matthews, Senator Cameron, and William Walter Phelps. They bought for $8,000, the lots at the corner of Connecticut Avenue and Eighteenth Street. A first payment of $10,000 was made and circulars were issued inviting subscriptions. Plans for the church were prepared; but under the circumstances then existing it was deemed advisable to commence on a small scale. A modest chapel was, therefore, erected on the rear of the lot, and this was opened for public worship October 1, 1885. The church, as formally organized by the Presbytery, consisted of fifty-three members, resident, then Senator, Harrison being one.

The first invitation to the pastorate issued by the church was to the Rev. S. S. Mitchell, D. D. of Buffalo, N. Y.; but this was declined. A few months later the attention of the church was directed to Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D., of Cincinnati, whose scholarly and evangelical discourses several of the members had heard. An invitation was sent to him and was accepted. Dr. Hamlin entered on the pastorate in March, 1886, and at once began his work with energy and vigor. He was in the prime of life, having been born, at Schenectady, N. Y., on May 31, 1847. His collegiate education had been received at Union College, from which he graduated in 1867, and at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, from which he graduated in 1871. The membership of the church had increased from the original fifty-three to ninety-nine when Dr. Hamlin was installed. Without neglecting the "ninety and nine" the new pastor labored so successfully that outsiders were brought in rapidly, and in a few months the roll contained two hundred and fifty names.

The chapel had by that time become too small for the congregation. More room was urgently needed, and as plans for the church were in the hands of the trustees, and the ground had been purchased, a vigorous effort was made to raise the necessary funds. The erection of the new building was commenced in April, 1887. It was expected that it would be ready for occupation by the fall of 1888, but in August of that year, an accident occurred which postponed the completion of the edifice. The noble tower, which is a prominent feature of the building, fell, crushing in the front wall and wrecking the body of the church. This was a disappointment as well as a serious loss, but there was no delay in beginning the work of reconstruction. All was finished except the tower by February, 1889, and the building was dedicated. The entire cost was $215,000. The enthusiasm and liberality of the congregation was proved on the day of the opening when no less a sum than $22,000 was contributed.

The Church is a skillful combination of the Italian and Romanesque styles of architecture. It is built of creamy white stone, partly from the Potomac quarries, and partly from Ohio. The tower is twenty feet square at the base, and rises to a height of 148 feet. The church is a parallelogram in form, with the great tower on the left. On the right is a low, small-turreted tower flanked by a low-roofed projection forming the vestibule for an entrance, corresponding with another through the main tower. The lantern-sides and roofs are covered with dark, red glazed tiles. The interior is finished in light, tasteful style. Four flat arches, springing from four large pillars support the lantern with its domed roof. The pillars are bronzed, and the arches are finished in plaster, in low relief. A wainscot of oak rising to a height of thirteen feet meets the ivory colored walls, and matches the seats, which are also of polished oak. In an arch at the back of the pulpit is the organ, which has three manuals and thirty-nine stops. The pulpit and communion-table are made of olive, oak and cedar. The logs from which they were carved were brought from the Holy Land by Dr. Hamlin. The communion-table is a beautiful piece of work, being a miniature representation of Solomon's Temple. All the decorations are in exquisite taste and are harmonious throughout.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Exposure of Mr. Parnell's Immorality caused an exciting discussion last week on both sides the Atlantic. It was contended, on the one hand, that he ought to be deposed from the leadership of the Irish party in Parliament. On the other hand it was urged that he should be retained on account of his proved ability as a Parliamentary tactician, which was not impaired by his moral obliquity. The Irish members of Parliament evidently held the latter opinion, for on November 25, they met and unanimously re-elected him to his old position as their leader. Mr. Gladstone, however, announces that he will not act with him, and without the help of Mr. Gladstone and his followers there is no hope of the Irish party achieving the object of their efforts. Here, as in England, Mr. Gladstone's course has been severely criticized. As his relations with Parnell would be exclusively political, he is blamed for allowing the wickedness of his private life to disturb their public association. Christian men, however, ought not to be among those who condemn him. He deserves the moral support of every God-fearing man on earth, for his decision, the necessity for which he undoubtedly deplores, is in accord with the Apostolic injunction "not to keep company" with a man guilty of the crime proved against Parnell. (1. Cor. 5: 11.)

The Discovery of Charley Ross, whose Abduction sixteen years ago startled and perplexed the whole country, was announced by a New York news-sheet on Wednesday last. It will be remembered that on July 1, 1874, the boy, then four years old, was carried off from the neighborhood of his father's home in Philadelphia by two men, who drove away with him in a wagon. A thorough search was made for him without success. After a few days his father received a letter stating that the writer was one of the men who had stolen the child, and offering to restore him if the father would pay a ransom of $20,000. It also stated that if the money was not paid the boy would be killed. The father after some negotiation promised to pay the money on the production of his son. This the thieves would not do, as they had good reason for believing that they would be arrested. They demanded that the money should be paid first, and promised that the boy should be restored within ten hours. As there was no security, apart from that promise, that the thieves would fulfil their part of the bargain, the money was not paid. Though the detectives searched diligently, and large rewards were offered for the discovery of the boy, no trace of him was found. Now a young man has been found in a prison in Massachusetts who claims to be Charley Ross. He is confined there on a charge of theft, his age and his associations give plausibility to his claim, but the father is unable to recognize him. The unkind suspicion is entertained by some persons that Mr. Ross is averse to recognizing the youth as his son on account of his being in prison, preferring to be deprived of him rather than have him back with criminal propensities. It would not be surprising if in such circumstances a father did feel so; and the perception of that fact has sometimes prevented great sinners, from seeking reconciliation with their heavenly Father. It need not, however, keep them back; for God has explicitly declared that he will receive them however vile they may have become. (Isa. 1: 18.)

A Chinaman's Wedding in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, on Nov. 27, has occasioned some comment in society. Miss Lillian Roundey has taken an active part in the work Dr. MacArthur is conducting among the Chinese. Among the Chinamen who have been her pupils is Yoong Shing, a native of Hong Kong. His countrymen in New York regarded him as a somewhat disreputable character, and say that he was given to fan-tan playing and other bad habits. He proved an apt pupil and learned more than he expected. Under Miss Roundey's tuition he began to read the New Testament, and God blessed it to his conversion. After giving evidence in his life of the reality of his change of heart, he was received into Dr. MacArthur's Church. Since then his conduct has been consistent with his profession, one proof of the reality of his conversion being the concern he manifested for the Christian welfare of his countrymen in the city. His acquaintance with his teacher continued, but nothing was thought of it by her friends until Thursday last, when, to the surprise of all, they were married. Some of the bride's friends are speaking of the marriage as a misalliance, but as the bridegroom is intelligent and a Christian, there is no reasonable ground for so characterizing the marriage. No censure of the kind is heard when, as frequently happens, a Christian marries a worldlyling, though such a union is explicitly prohibited in the New Testament. (II. Cor. 6: 14.)

The Recently Discovered Process of Making aluminium, mentioned in this journal three weeks ago, is to be put to practical test. The announcement is made in a financial journal that a company has been formed to produce aluminium by the new process. The experiments so far made have satisfied metallurgists that the metal is in all respects equal to the best aluminium now in the market. Its superiority to iron for many purposes has long been recognized, but as it cost five dollars a pound its use was restricted. Now this useful metal can be produced for ten cents a pound, and even after the labor of hardening and strengthening it, the cost will not be more than fifty cents. As these processes do not decrease its chief advantages of lightness and pliability, the metal will probably come into common use when the company now organized produces it on a large scale. The surprising feature of the discovery is that by chemical agency the metal is produced from common clay. It would thus appear that we have always had close to our hand material, which we have deemed comparatively worthless, but which was capable of yielding results of inestimable value. It is so in society. The men whom it has been the fashion to speak of as the dregs of society and the lawless classes, might become the sons of God, and jewels in Christ's crown under the influence of the Holy Spirit if they were led to the Saviour. None know this better than those Christian workers who have learned the lesson which God taught Peter, to "call no man common or unclean." (Acts 10: 28.)

JESUS MADE KNOWN.

S. S. LESSON FOR DEC. 14, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 24 : 28-43 ; GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 24 : 31.

The Written Word Interpreted by the Living Word—The Meaning of the Symbols and Types Revealed—The Disciples' Hearts Burning—Their Appeal to the Master—Recognized in the Familiar Attitude—The Blessing of Personal Communion—The Glad News Communicated—Jesus Appearing to the Assembly—His Benediction.

TO the true disciple what is there nearer heaven than an hour spent over the Word of God, in the very presence of the Master, when the Holy Spirit, either through fellow-Christians, or by his own direct teaching in the Word, opens to his absorbed attention the things "touching the King!" We know no joy like it. Such must have been that walk to Emmaus! The old Book of Genesis in which the two disciples had read of the creation, the flood, the call of Abraham, the history of the patriarchs, now Shone With a New Lustre.

The seed of the woman who should bruise the head of the serpent (Gen. 3 : 15), was a clue to all the rest. What! Was he, whom they knew only as the condemned and executed criminal in the eyes of the world at Jerusalem, the one centre on whom all the Scriptures hung? Was his resurrection told in the story of the flood? Did it live again in the sacrifice of Isaac, and the provided lamb of Jehovah? (Gen. 22 : 6-13.) Was Jesus the Shiloh of Jacob's blessing upon Judah? (Gen. 49 : 10.) Did they understand now his own word, "Before Abraham was, I am" (John 8 : 58), and did they know him as the "I am that I am" who was revealed to Moses when he was sent of God to be the visible representative of their hidden Deliverer? (Ex. 3 : 41.)

The old Scriptures were all new, Joshua and his victories, and the man with a drawn sword (Josh. 5 : 13), Gideon and his three hundred (Judg. 7 : 7), David's life, and the strongly accentuated teaching of Christ all through the Psalms,—O how it made them live before these eager learners! Jesus was the "beloved" of the Canticles, the Lamb, "dumb before her shearers," and the foretold sacrifice whose stripes healed, in Isaiah, "the Lord our righteousness" in Jeremiah 23 : 6, himself the vision of Ezekiel; the Healer of his people in Hosea 6 : 1 ; 11 : 3 ; 14 : 4, the coming Lord in Joel, who will dwell in the midst of his people (3 : 16, 17); In Nahum "he knoweth them that trust in him" (1 : 7), in Zephaniah, he is the King of Israel and the Bridegroom of his people (3 : 15-17), in Haggai, the Builder of his temple; in Zechariah, the Priest who bears the filthy garments of his people (3 : 3), the smitten Shepherd (13 : 7), and finally, the coming Conqueror in Malachi, he comes as a "Refiner" of his people, and then suddenly to take possession of his cleansed temple (3 : 4).

Was then all this unseen and unexpected glory lying dormant in that lowly man of Galilee, whom they had followed, and whose wondrous works they had witnessed, without recognizing in any fullness who it was that taught them? Their hearts began to Burn Within Them.

But the truth they heard was clearer to their apprehension than the person of their Lord : truly "their eyes were holden that they should not know him." The clearness with which any of us may grasp intellectually any truth of God is no guarantee that that truth will have power in our lives. "The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." (John 6 : 63.) It is when that truth becomes a living, personal communication of Jesus to our souls, when he speaks it into our innermost being by the Holy Ghost, and will, idea, thought and prejudice fall down before it, it is then that it becomes a reality. A truth of God is never anything real to us

Until it Has Conquered Us.

The two disciples and their unknown companion drew near to the village, and "he made as though he would have gone further. But they constrained him saying, Abide with us : for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." Such an appeal from disciples, however dull of spiritual apprehension, never met with a repulse from the Master. His presence, although unrecognized, was appreciated. The Master is not only near to us, but within us ; and often we do not recognize him. But when we are absorbed by him and his Word, let our feelings be what they may, he is at hand. Let us own his presence, he dwells in our hearts (Eph. 3 : 17), and he loves to be recognized.

"And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them." The old familiar action, the voice, the movements, so recalled Jesus—it could be no other—"their eyes were opened, and they knew him." But before an exclamation could be uttered, he was gone—he had "vanished out of their sight." But the precious teachings he had given them remained. In the Scriptures, clearer and more valuable than ever before, they possessed the living, speaking Word of God. "And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?" O beloved reader, when in the quiet of your chamber, your heart burns within you as your quiet Teacher, the Holy Ghost, makes Jesus real to you in his own Word, don't be in a hurry to turn to something else. Let the Master have a Mary at his feet to whom he can be free to speak out all his heart. He loves to be understood, he seeks for receptive souls, and from all else to give him the attention which his communications merit. Let anything wait rather than your Lord, let any one wait rather than he, and to this end, Oh, seek to have time alone with him when you are not likely to be interrupted; his own chosen time, the early morning, if possible.

The two disciples "rose up the same hour," their hearts were too full to keep the precious treasure to themselves; freely they had received, they must freely give, they must let the other disciples share their treasure; they returned to Jerusalem and "found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them"—probably much the same company who, a few weeks later, were gathered in an upper room to "wait for the promise of the Father;" the eleven, the women, Mary the mother of Jesus and his brethren, the number of the names being about one hundred and twenty.

Before these two disciples could tell their story, they were met with the glad tidings, "the Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared unto Simon." Then they let out their full hearts and told "what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in the breaking of bread." Surely more hearts must have burned within them now. The little band of believers was going through a crisis; all was so unlike what they had expected; they must have been like men in a dream. And yet, there was no other topic on which they could speak, the old strife as to which should be the greatest was done away in the light of their risen Lord; himself filled their thoughts, himself filled their horizon. While thus speaking of him, unannounced and unexpected, he "stood in the midst of them," with a word which he had purchased the right to say to them,

"Peace be Unto You."

He had made peace with the wronged, and broken law "through the blood of his cross" (Col. 1 : 20), and now, in the triumph of his love and justice, he brings the fruit of his sufferings to his beloved followers, and says to the Peter who had denied him, the disciples who had forsaken him and fled, the two who had walked with him, and been taught by him without so much as knowing their Lord—"Peace be unto you." But these disciples, men yet in the flesh, the Spirit of God did not yet possess them so as to make it possible for them to understand spiritual things as they did after the day of Pentecost. When the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon the flesh, it fades and withers like the grass. (Isa. 40 : 7.) Thus it is no wonder that "they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit." A sudden appearance of Jesus, independently of doors unrestrained by human or material limits, was so new a thing that the flesh shrank back. And perhaps, if they knew him, the self-consciousness which the first sight of him they had so wronged would awaken, called to their minds how untrue they had been to him, so that they were ill at ease. And he said unto them, "Why are ye troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself. Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet." "And while they yet believed not for joy," they were so overpowered with the revelation of their crucified but risen Saviour, "He said unto them, have ye here any meat? And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb. And he took it and did eat before them." And so, in his own wondrous delicacy of love, he set them at ease in his presence.

PRE-MILLENNIALISM DEFINED.

An Address Delivered at the Recent Prophetic Conference in the Centennial Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

By REV. CLARENCE LARKIN.

THE common belief to-day, which is the belief of Post-Millennialists, is that the Gospel is to be preached to all nations until the whole world shall be converted to Christ, and then shall follow a universal reign of righteousness and peace, called the Millennium, followed by a short season of awful wickedness and apostasy, to close which Christ shall come, and there shall be a simultaneous resurrection of the righteous and the wicked to be instantly followed by a general judgment, that the world is then to be destroyed by fire, that Christ shall then surrender up all to God, and that God shall then be all in all.

Pre-Millennialists, on the other hand, believe that the world, instead of growing better, will grow worse and worse, until

Christ Shall Come

and raise the righteous dead and translate the living saints, and having gathered them before his judgment seat in the air, reward them according to their works. The Jews are then to be gathered back to their land, along with the lost ten tribes, all in an unconverted state. Antichrist then sets up his kingdom, enters into a league with restored Israel, and, when he gets them in his power, acts the traitor and subjects them to such an awful persecution that it is called in Matthew's Gospel and the Apocalypse, "The Great Tribulation." After a short period this persecution is ended by the revelation of Jesus Christ with his saints, and the "Man of Sin" is destroyed by the brightness of his coming. The beast and the false prophet are cast into the lake of fire, and Satan is bound and cast into the bottomless pit. The living nations on the earth are then summoned to judgment. The "Goat" nations are destroyed, and the "Sheep" nations, along with Christ's brethren, the Jews, become the nations over which Christ establishes

His Earthly Dominion.

The government is a "Theocracy," with Christ as King and his saints as coadjutors. Then follows a thousand years of Millennial glory, after which, Satan is loosed from the pit, deceives the outlying nations, Gog and Magog, gathers them to battle, and they are destroyed by fire from heaven. Satan is then cast into the lake of fire, the earth is renovated by fire, God's people being preserved in some way during the operation, and then caused to inhabit the new earth. Then the wicked dead are raised, the fallen angels are summoned from Tartarus, the books are opened and the Judgment of "The Great White Throne" is set : ending with all those whose names are not ten in the Book of Life being cast into the fire. Then follow the eternal ages. From foregoing it will be seen that Pre-Millennialism do not consider

The Resurrection and Judgment Days—days of twenty-four hours, but as periods, ending over at least a thousand years. They recognize at least two resurrections, those of the righteous and the wicked, a thousand years apart: and they expect four Judgments: first, the righteous in Christ, for their sins; second, of the righteous for their works when Christ comes and removes his Church; third, judgment of nations; and fourth, the judgment of the wicked dead, known as the "final judgment."

The Pre-Millennial view of the second advent is a new doctrine. It dates back to the days of the prophets, and is largely the subject of their prophecies. Particularly is this so of the prophets, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah and Malachi, who prophesied during the period from 700 to 400 B. C. It was clearly taught by Christ, and firmly held by the Apostles and the early Church. It is a common, yet wholly erroneous impression, that the Pre-Millennial faith is based mainly, if not solely, on a disputed passage of the Apocalypse. (Rev. 20: 4-6.) The fact that the main question at issue (whether Christ's return will precede or follow the Millennium) antedates the Apocalypse, and would have been a question of no less interest and importance through this dispensation if the Apocalypse had never been written. The Old Testament prophets, in plain language, and in living terms, foretold an era of universal righteousness and peace on this earth, under the reign of Messiah the Prince. (See Joel 2: 18; Amos 9: 13; Micah 4: 3, 4; Jer. 31: 34; Is. 2: 14; Daniel 7: 13-27.)

That the disciples were not mistaken in their idea of such an earthly kingdom, ruled over by the promised Messiah, is evident from the fact that Jesus never reproved them for holding such a view. And, after his resurrection, and previous to his ascension when they asked him he would at that time restore the kingdom to Israel (Acts 1: 6), he did not say, "You are mistaken in your idea of a temporal kingdom; the kingdom I came to set up as predicted by the prophets is a spiritual kingdom." But he said, "It is not for you to know the times and seasons." After Christ's ascension the disciples fully apprehended the matter of "the kingdom," and their sermons and epistles were full of exhortations to wait for his return. They lived and acted the firm conviction that he might return at any time, and establish his kingdom and until that kingdom was set up on the earth, they did not look for a fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies, that promised a reign of earthly righteousness and peace. The Apostolic Church was Pre-Millennial in its teaching and belief.

The Origin of Post-Millennialism. For over two hundred years no other idea than that of the Pre-Millennial return of Christ was entertained by the primitive Church. The writings of the Church Fathers abound in evidence of the fact. But about 250 A. D., Origen, one of the fathers, conceived the idea that the words of Scripture were but the husk in which were hid the kernel of Scripture truth. At once he began to allegorize and spiritualize Scripture, and thus founded that school of interpreters from which the Church and the Bible have suffered so much. As time went on, the prophetic portions of the Word of God became a sealed book, and ignorance, like the gloom of night, settled down upon all Christendom, and innumerable errors prowled through the midnight blackness, threatening the utter extinction of the Gospel. But amid the gloom God was not without witnesses to the truth. The Waldenses, Paulicians and other sects, believed in the Pre-Millennial return of the Lord. But that doctrine was not the only one that was eclipsed during the "dark ages"; the doctrine of justification by faith disappeared in the thick darkness, and star after star went out, but the gloom was not eternal. When the fullness of time was come, that "Morning Star of the Reformation," John Wycliffe arose and was followed by Luther, and Calvin and Knox and with the resurrection of the doctrine of justification by faith, the doctrine of the pre-Millennial return of the Lord was revived. When the persecution aroused by the Reformation ceased, the time of peace and prosperity became as it always has been in the history of the Church, a time of peril. Rationalism refused to believe that the world was ripening for judgment and a new way of interpreting the prophecies appeared. The Rev. Daniel Whitby, in the early part of the eighteenth century propounded the theory which is generally held at the present time by those who are not expecting the Lord's return till after the Millennium. He taught that the Millennium was not a reign of persons raised from the dead, but of the Church flourishing gloriously for a thousand years after the conversion and restoration of the Jews to their own land; and then Christ would come the second time.

Thus, Post-Millennialism, as advocated in our day is not yet two hundred years old, while Pre-Millennialism dates back to the days of Isaiah and Daniel.

A RECOGNITION OF CHARACTER.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Dec. 14. "And their eyes were opened and they knew him." Luke 24: 31.

AN interesting story is told in connection with one of the regiments of the English Army, and has been embodied in a book by a famous author. Stripped of its voluminous details it runs as follows:

The most popular officer in the regiment was a certain Captain Eldon. The officers called him "the Chevalier," from his high standard of honor and his gallantry. He was known to be poor, yet it was to him that everybody went who needed help in a difficulty. Captain Eldon would deny himself any pleasure or luxury, if by doing so he could relieve another. Too often he forgot his own financial engagements, and lent a brother officer the money which should have been reserved to pay a debt of his own. This generosity involved him in embarrassments that distressed him greatly. He seemed to love everyone, but the chief place in his heart was occupied by his younger brother Hugh who was an ensign in the same regiment. Hugh needed all his elder brother's care, for he was fond of pleasure, was reckless in his expenditure and had not the same sense of honor that kept his brother upright in spite of his embarrassments.

One day Hugh went to his brother with an urgent request for money. Captain Eldon could not give it to him being himself absolutely without funds. Hugh did not explain his difficulty, but the pallor on his face showed how terribly he was disappointed by his brother's inability to help him. "I must have the money to-day," he said. "I cannot do without it. Borrow it, will you not? The Major would lend it you."

"No; I cannot do that, Hugh. I suppose he would lend it; but I am not sure. Anyhow I could not bring myself to ask him."

Hugh went away muttering, and evidently in great distress. The fact was that he had been gambling and owed a large sum, which it was impossible to pay. Probably Captain Eldon would have investigated the trouble had he not been just then so worried by his own affairs. He had, too, an idea that Hugh would be the better for knowing that he could not count on getting money from him, whenever he wanted it.

A few weeks later, the regiment being then stationed in Ireland, the Major went to Captain Eldon's quarters, and asked him if he recollected receiving a cheque from him. "I do not remember ever paying you anything," he said. "I do not call to mind writing such a cheque, but my bankers have received one, and have paid it. It is for rather a large sum, and they are in doubt now about the signature. It is made out to you and endorsed by you."

"No," said Captain Eldon; "It must be a forgery. I have never had money from you."

"I thought not. Then I shall tell the bank to look after the forger."

After the Major was gone, a horrible suspicion crossed Captain Eldon's mind. He remembered Hugh's distress that day when he came to him for money and the suggestion he made of applying for help to the Major; could it be possible that Hugh in his desperation had committed the forgery? He must see at once, and he strode off to Hugh's quarters.

Captain Eldon's face was ghastly as he came out after the interview with Hugh. He went to the proper quarter and obtained leave of absence and was soon speeding away in the fast express to London to see the bankers and try to arrange some way of rescuing his brother.

That night there was an appalling railroad accident. The train by which Captain Eldon travelled was wrecked, and many of the passengers were lying dead, at the bottom of a swift river, under the shattered cars. He was unhurt, and crawling through a window, he rose to the surface and stood dazed on the bank. A sudden impulse entered his mind. He was pressed with debts, this difficulty of his brother's would bring disgrace upon him; would it not solve all the difficulties if he disappeared. They would find his valise in the wrecked car and would think he had been killed. The bankers would think that it was he who had committed the forgery, and the Major would pay the money to save his friend's memory from stain. The plan seemed good; though afterward when he had more time to think of it, but when it was too late to retrace his steps, he saw its folly.

It turned out as he expected. His friends thought him dead. The bank succeeded in convincing the Major that Captain Eldon had committed the crime, and the Major, doubtful at first, thought it might be possible when he learned the extent of Captain Eldon's embarrassments. The whole regiment mourned for the officer and no one was told of the forgery.

Years passed, and nothing was heard of Captain Eldon. The Major quitted the army and was travelling around the world. Dining one day with some French officers in Algiers, one of them told a story of a soldier in his troop who was, he said, one of the most chivalrous men he had ever met. He had rescued an Algerian woman from a fate worse than death, and had displayed magnanimity toward a disarmed enemy whose malignity was notorious.

"By-the-way, Major," the French officer said, turning to the guest of the evening, "I believe he is a countryman of yours. He speaks excellent French, but I have thought several times, when he was off his guard, that I detected the English accent on his tongue."

The subject recurred later in the evening when the two officers were chatting together after the others had dispersed. The French officer was eloquent about the fine qualities of his trooper and told other incidents about his gallantry and generosity. "I knew just such a man once," said the major, "and in all my military experience only that one. I loved him like a brother. Poor fellow! he was killed in a railroad accident." He went on to describe Captain Eldon with much enthusiasm.

"I am glad," said the French officer, "to find a man who can appreciate such qualities, very few do admire them as I do. You must come to-morrow and see my trooper."

Thoughts of Captain Eldon kept the Major awake that night. The stories he had heard of the Algerian trooper were so like the actions of his old friend. Then he thought of the forgery and a clue to the mystery entered his mind. He was up early and at the parade-ground fully convinced that the trooper was no other than Captain Eldon in disguise. "I can recognize him by his character," he said. "He is not dead after all." And he was right. The Major would have passed the trooper without recognizing him, so much had the African sun and his hard life changed Captain Eldon; but the revelation of his character had put him on the alert and that day the two old friends were reunited and the whole story told.

CHRISTIAN WORK.

A GREAT deal of the work we are called upon to do in this world is unsatisfactory.

It is so many pounds to be lifted, or so many miles to be walked, or so many wheels to be tired, or so many feet of wall to be constructed; and when the work is done, and we get our wages; or when the goods are sold, and we get our pay; or when the column is written, and we receive our compensation, our work seems there and then to end. But it is not so with distinctively Christian work. There the fabric is immortal, the tools are immortal, the results are immortal. If an architect constructs a bridge, or raises a secular institution, he has his name chiselled on the buttress of the bridge, and the elements may beat against it, but for scores and hundreds of years the words chiselled into that stone will last, and tell to coming generations who built the bridge and who reared the structure. But after the passage of a certain number of years, the bridge will fall, the secular building will crumble, and the name of the architect will be forgotten. He built with perishable material, and, of course, his name finally vanishes. But he who works in Christian departments inweaves his name into that which is imperishable, and there shall be no power in the roll of centuries of time, or cycles of eternity, to efface that word. Who will be the men that will be remembered longest? Those who have achieved the largest fortunes, gained the highest secular position, won the most resounding name, led the largest military host? or will it be those whose personal and high-hearted consecration to the service of God make their life parallel in all the future with the life of the everlasting God? Men sometimes build monuments for their fellows at large expense of hundreds and thousands of dollars, but how little satisfaction in the rearing of such structures that stand generally in the cemeteries! Only a few men pass them thoughtfully, and stop and read the inscription and learn the lesson of the life and death of the man whose departure is there announced. The vast majority go along, and they whistle and they smoke and they forget. Whereas the man who gives anything to the cause of Jesus Christ, who toils in religious departments, is building a monument that will last for eternal ages.

It is impossible that it be defaced; it is impossible that it ever crumble. That thought ought to give great satisfaction to Christian workmen. There is in the final reminiscences of life a great thrill of comfort connected with the service of God. We have seen a great many people die. We have never heard one of them talk in this wise: "I invented a new sewing-machine. I built a large house. I gathered three hundred thousand dollars. I made a bid in the money market that shook all the cities." Men in their last hour never have any such reminiscence. The accumulations and emoluments and achievements of this world to the Christian man, in his closing moment, do not seem worth a single mention. But we have heard a great many Christians in their last moments express it as a matter of gratitude to God that they have been permitted to work in the Church, and consecrate their energies to religious uses.

There is also a heavenly-world reminiscence of Christian work that must be highly delightful and satisfactory. When we reach heaven we will have a great deal of time to think. How very small this world will seem when looked upon from that high residence, and all that we may have gathered up in this world will seem insignificant. But suppose that in this world we set our hand and heart to serve God, in that blessed land we shall see all around us the results of our work. Suppose, now, that in this world a man had given one hundred dollars to the cause of Christ, and that one hundred dollars went toward the building of a church, the construction of a pew, the fashioning of an organ which should sound forth the praises of God, the molding of a bell which should ring out to all the city invitation for worship. Suppose that through the contribution of one hundred dollars, he has been the means in this world of saving two souls, and that those two souls, have been the means of saving ten souls, and the ten of bringing a hundred into the kingdom of God, and the hundred a thousand, and the thousand a million, and the million still more millions, the tide of influence rolling on through all the ages of eternity. Now, I suppose the soul, rising up in heaven, will have the skill and acumen to trace out all those lines of influence, and trace them all back to one contribution which he made a thousand years before in a Christian church on earth. God will permit him to see that he did it—it was his instrumentality, starting that one contribution. We suppose that will be one of our sweetest occupations in heaven, if we have accomplished anything for Christ on earth, to count, measure it, weigh it, estimate it. Now, if there is so much satisfaction in Christian work, why not let all us enter it?

THE MINISTER'S WIFE.

WE see frequent allusion to the hardships of ministers' wives. Indeed, they have their trials. They have not only to look after the congregation, but the minister. The pastor's wife has to be the friendly critic of the husband's sermon and its delivery. If the preacher come home with the suspicion that he has made a dead failure in his discourse, she has to persuade him that it was not as bad as he supposed; that he will yet hear of good done by it; that our weakest efforts may sometimes result in a great harvest; that she liked it better this time than when he preached it in the other settlements, etc. She has to stand between him and the door-bell; suppress unpleasant things brought to the house by pestiferous gossips; tear up insulting anonymous letters; and often, on a small salary, navigate a household around the Cape Horn of large expenses. But oh, the joys of being a minister's wife! Is she not generally the pet of the congregation? If she have culture and disposition, she will have more attention shown her than any other lady in the neighborhood receives. She is sought after, bowed to, and consulted on all sides. She has an open door to all the confidences of the people. In a word, no one has so fair a chance as she. She may sometimes complain about the hardships of her station, but she is really so well satisfied with her place that she would not exchange with any one else. We can think of no position more desirable than that of a minister's wife except that of a minister. Trials—of course. What women are without them? Ever since Eve was down sick from eating too many harvest apples, woman has had troubles; but the parsonage is not the favorite place for the congregating. The merriest wives we have seen, all up and down the land, are minister companions. We congratulate the parsonage of Christendom!

WOMAN IMPROVED.

IT may be ungallant to suppose that there is or has been, any room for improvement but we venture the opinion that in the last ten years there has been a marked bettering of the physical condition of American women. Whether it is a result of gymnastics or the travelling of many of our girls in foreign lands where they have had an opportunity of admiring the superior physical qualities of English and German women, or the general discussion of the subject, we do not know. Perhaps the fact that so many of those females who pride themselves on their bewitching languors and fashionable invalidism have been passed by when our young men came to make selection of lifetime partners, may have helped to cure the folly. It has been found that doll-babies are of but little worth in the struggle of life, and capacity on the part of a woman to sweep out a drawing-room without fainting, and to make a loaf of bread not sour nor soggy, is of more importance than the satin in a cheek which the fingers of diphtheria may unravel, or the color of the hair which a strong grip of fever may pull out. We find cause for congratulation in the fact that woman's physical condition is rising, but there is room yet for higher stages of advancement. Turn the girls out of doors even chance you have. Let them, properly accompanied, botanize in the fields and geologize among the rocks. Deny them not oar or saddle. A race of weak women will make a race of puny men. We are not ambitious for Amazons, nor for women going through the land bawling about their rights, but out-and-out Christian women, who enjoy what rights they have and support great souls in bodies that contain them.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Famous Banker Dead—Brazil's Compliment to the United States—Ocean Post-Offices—Will Parnell Retire? Holland's Dead Monarch—A Missing Arch-Duke.

One of the Leading Bankers of the World, August Belmont, died suddenly in New York City, on Monday the 25th inst., of pneumonia. He was born at Alzei, in Hesse-armstadt, Germany, in 1816, his father being a small landed proprietor, and his mother a companion in the service of the wife of the founder of the famous banking house at Frankfort, Anselm Mayer Rothschild. He received a commercial education, and was taken into the employ of the great banker where he swept out the offices and studied hard to make himself valuable. His industry and carefulness were appreciated, and while still a very young man, he was entrusted by the firm with important duties as secretary and companion. He distinguished himself in certain large negotiations with the Papal and Bourbon Governments and in 1837, was appointed the Rothschilds' representative at Havana. He reached New York while the great panic of that year was at its height, and was ordered to remain there and guard the firm's interests. New York has been his station ever since. When our civil war broke out, on his advice, many millions of its bonds were purchased abroad. In 1844, he was appointed Consul-General of Austria to this country, but he relinquished the post in 1850 on account of his sympathies with Hungary. Under the Buchanan administration, he was appointed United States Minister to The Hague. He helped to raise the first German regiment in New York in 1861. He has for many years been an active factor in politics although never holding any office further than already stated. A social magnate, a great art collector and millionaire many times over, he had a warm heart for the poor and his private charities were numerous. His portrait is given in this column.

The Youngest American Republic Paid its respects to our government last week and presented to President Harrison a medal of gold and palladium, in commemoration of our prompt recognition of the new Republic. Two Brazilian warships, the Aquidaban and Guanabara, arrived in New York harbor on Wednesday, 26th inst., and were escorted through the Narrows and up the Bay by the Dolphin and Yorktown, amid the booming of guns and the usual exchange of naval courtesies, all the forts along shore joining the cannonading. The Aquidaban is a steamer very like the Maine of our own navy, recently launched, but smaller and with a lighter armament. The Guanabara is an old style wooden vessel. On landing, Admiral da Silveira and his staff were accorded a very imposing reception, at which many high officials were present. The visitors were entertained at a banquet at the Fifth Avenue Hotel by Admiral Walker, as the representative of the President. Next day the Brazilians left for Washington where the medal was presented to President Harrison with due formality. It bears the inscription "Estados Unido do Brazil, 15 de Novembro de 1890." On the reverse is an eagle, with the United States coat-of-arms, flying toward Brazil, and beneath it the motto: "A Republica dos Estados Unidos de America." The Brazilians will remain in Washington several days.

Strange Disclosures are now Made Concerning the Sioux "Messiah" Craze. It is said that there has at no time been any danger of a rising among the Indians, and that all the stories to that effect were telegraphed by interested speculators for the purpose of having the government send large bodies of troops to South Dakota. The dances of the redskins are over and most of the dancers have come into the agencies quietly and disclaimed any intention of revolting against the government. They have been very badly scared by the presence of so many troops, hemming them in on all sides. It is likely that the War Department will order an investigation of this latest Indian excitement, for the purpose of learning the authors of the wild stories of incipient rebellion and massacre. There is talk of disarming the Indians and compelling them to go to work upon the reservation, but it is not expected that the government would sanction any course that would excite disturbance or deprive the Indian of his hunting weapons.

A Novelty in Our Foreign Postal Service has been devised by Mr. Wanamaker who, in his official report, recommends to Congress the inauguration of ocean post-offices. In other words, the Postmaster-General proposes to have all the outgoing and incoming foreign mails sorted on shipboard, by regular Postal clerks, in order that their delivery may be expedited both here and abroad. Germany has already agreed to the arrangement, and England and France have it now under consideration.

Mr. Parnell Has Surprised His Friends and Enemies alike by his determination to retain his grasp on the leadership of his party, in spite of the remonstrances of many of the ablest men in Parliament, and especially of Mr. Gladstone who, in a letter to Mr. Morley, declared that "Parnell's continuance in the leadership would be disastrous in the highest degree to the cause of Ireland." A similar letter was written by the ex-Premier to Justin McCarthy, but as the latter might under certain circumstances have been Mr. Parnell's probable successor, he could not act upon it as freely as Mr. Morley. Gladstone's unhesitating condemnation of private immorality in public men has produced a deep effect in Britain, although it was what might have been expected from such a quarter. The Catholic hierarchy of Ireland is said to have concluded that Parnell's retirement is necessary and this fact may decide what the politicians have failed to accomplish.

Less Than Ten Years Ago, a Young Austrian prince of the famous House of Hapsburg, threw rank, titles and decorations to the winds, and set out to make a new career for himself by his own unaided talents. He had come to see the vanity of earthly greatness, and to estimate at their proper worth the hollow honors conferred by the world upon its favorites. This prince was Arch-Duke John of Austria, who came of a line of monarchs who formerly ruled over the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, previous to the Italian Revolution of 1859. He was a young man of strong character, and had already risen by merit alone to the rank of general, when his progressive opinions gave offence at the Austrian Court. He chose the life of a sailor, and assuming the name of Captain Johann Orth, took command of a merchant vessel, the Santa Margarita, trading along the coasts of South America. In London he married a poor girl, and they sailed together in July last for Montevideo. Sickness prostrated several of his crew, and, while in this condition he attempted to round Cape Horn in the face of a cyclone, since which time he, the Margarita and her crew, have not been heard of. This occurred four months ago and the failure to learn anything concerning his fate has occasioned great gloom at the Austrian Court. A portrait of this self-denying and heroic prince is given above.

The Commercial and Financial World Has once more quieted down, and, as was foreshadowed in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, the danger of panic has passed over. Now that the affairs of the Barings have been adjusted, facts are coming out which show beyond doubt that all the recent trouble was the direct result of over-speculation. The lesson of the failure has already had a salutary effect in checking unwise investment and over-speculation on both sides of the Atlantic. Meanwhile a panic prevails in Buenos Ayres, being the reflex of the Baring affair, which has disturbed every money centre in the world.

Holland is Sorrowing over the Death of its monarch, King William III., on the 24th., of general paresis and softening of the brain. As recently stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he was for many years in an enfeebled condition and toward the last, the governing power was placed in the hands of his consort, Queen Emma, as Regent. Princess Wilhelmina was proclaimed Queen by Parliament on the 24th inst. She is the daughter of the late King by his second wife and is still very young. The funeral of King William (whose portrait is given in this column), will take place on December 4th at The Hague.

BRIEF NOTES.

Helena, Mont., has decided by popular vote to have all the saloons closed on Sundays.

At yesterday's meeting of the Institute of Christian Philosophy, of which Dr. Charles F. Deems is President, a paper was read by Mrs. Elizabeth A. Reed of Chicago. Her subject was Krishna.

The revival services held by the Wesley Evangelists in St. Luke's M. E. Church, Brooklyn, were densely crowded all last week. On Sundays, Nov. 23, 30, the altar was thronged with seekers for the blessing.

The veteran Presbyterian missionary in China, Dr. A. P. Happer, is afflicted with disease of the heart, in consequence of which he has been compelled to abandon the work he has been doing for a new college in Canton.

A Sioux Indian and a Cheyenne Indian educated in Hampton Institute, addressed a meeting of the New York Indian Association, in New York, on Nov. 24. A delightful feature of the meeting was the singing of a choir of Indians.

Evangelist C. H. Yatman is having very successful meetings at Akron, O. Hundreds of young men have come forward as seekers, and the inquiry-room is the scene of many wonderful conversions. "We are looking," says Mr. Yatman, "for a regular Pentecost, which means three thousand converts."

Some remarkable meetings have been held by Mr. L. B. Heller during the past week in Bedford Ave. M. E. Tabernacle, Brooklyn. He has been assisted by Rev. D. Hancox, of Jersey City, N. J. At one of the services an address was given by a converted Mohammedan from Adrianople, Turkey.

The Union Revival Meetings, conducted by E. W. Bliss and Mr. Clark of Boston, at Southbridge Mass., are awakening a deep interest in the town and neighborhood. The Journal says that one hundred persons already have declared their determination by God's help to lead a Christian life henceforth. It adds: "The meetings will unquestionably give a great uplift to the moral and spiritual life of the town."

The second anniversary of the American Sabbath Union will take place in Philadelphia December 8th and 9th. The first public meeting will be held in the West Arch Street Presbyterian Church, corner Eighteenth and Arch Streets, on Monday evening, December 8th. Tuesday, December 9th, at 10.30 a. m., the annual meeting of the Union will be held in the First Baptist Church, corner Broad and Arch Streets, and at 7.30 p. m., the closing public service. Among the speakers will be Rev. Dr. John Hemphill, Rev. Dr. George Dana Boardman, Gov. James A. Beaver, of Pennsylvania, Major-General O. O. Howard and Judge N. Russell Thayer, of Philadelphia.

The Baptists of the Northwest have wisely availed themselves of the uncopyrighted idea of Dr. Walker, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Dakota, and have had a rolling church built. The car is sixty feet long and ten feet wide. A space eighteen feet long is reserved for missionaries, and the remainder is fitted up as a chapel. The car is to travel over all the great Northwest, and services will be held in it at suitable points.

The annual meeting of the King's Daughters and King's Sons was held on Nov. 21, in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York. Mrs. Margaret Bottom, who presided, said that the Order had now about one hundred and seventy thousand members. She also made the welcome announcement that the dispute about the requirements of admission to the Order, which had at one time threatened to introduce doctrinal differences, was now happily settled.

RUNAWAY JONAH.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Sad Sight—A Servant of God Running Away from his Work—His Motive—He had Plausible Reasons—The Lessons of the Incident—I. Never Follow an Impulse to do Wrong—Impulses Always to be Distrusted—Though they may be to do Something Brave—II. Never do Wrong Because it is Easy—III. Never Plead Providential Arrangements as an Excuse for Wrongdoing—IV. Never Plead the Lawfulness of the Wrong Act—Right for one Man may be Wrong for Another.

"But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord, and went down to Joppa; and he found a ship going to Tarshish." Jonah 1:3.

SAD sight! Here is a servant of God running away from his work. When we read that he fled from the presence of God, we do not suppose that Jonah thought that he could get away from God as to his omnipresence; but he wanted to escape serving in the divine presence: he wished to avoid being employed by God in his special service as a prophet. If he did not want to get away from the toilsome, and self-denying duty of prophecy, he did, at least, wish to avoid an expedition to the heathen of Nineveh—an expedition which, he foresaw, would not be for his own honor.

Now, why did he desire to get away from his work? Whatever reason he had, it must have been a bad one; for no servant of God ought, on any account whatever, to think of quitting the service of his Lord. We should not wish to avoid the doing of the Lord's will; but when we know what our duty is, we ought to follow it out with unswerving determination. We must not wish to leave our post, no, not even to go to heaven. We must not be crying, "Oh that I had wings like a dove!" What should we do with them if we had them? Such heavy mortals as some of us are had better keep nearer the ground.

What was his Reason?

Was it, in part, that he considered the work to be too great for him? Certainly he had a great task appointed him. "Nineveh, an exceeding great city of three-days' journey," how was one man to admonish and evangelize the whole of it? Preposterous! Might he not have been aided by at least one colleague? Even Moses had his Aaron. The odds were great against the lone man. Was that why Jonah ran away? I think not; but it has been the cause of the flight of many others. Is there a servant of God here who feels unequal to his work, and therefore wishes he could escape from it? My dear brother, you are unequal to your work, for you have no sufficiency of your own. I know also that I am, in and of myself, unequal to my own calling; shall we, therefore, run away? No, no; that is not the true line of argument; this is the reason why we should stick to our work all the more closely. With more prayer we shall have more power. I hardly think that fear of being overdone was Jonah's reason for deserting his Post.

Why did Jonah wish to run away? Because he did not like the Ninevites? I think that there was something of that kind on his mind. He was a stern old Jew, and he loved his race, and he felt no desire to see anything done for the Gentiles or for the heathen, outside the Abrahamic covenant; and therefore he had no passion for a mission to Nineveh. Is there anybody here who does not want to go to a certain service because he does not like the people? Will you flee unto Tarshish to get away from a dreaded sphere? Come, my dear brother, this must not be. If those to whom you are sent are greater sinners than others, they need Christ all the more; and if you have heard a very bad character of them, surely there is a call for you to elevate them. However, I am not sure that this was very much Jonah's case, though it may have been one of the many arguments that worked to produce his undutiful behavior.

Was it not, possibly, because Jonah knew that God was merciful? "Now," said he to himself,

"if I have to go through Nineveh and say, 'Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown,' and, if these people repent it will not be overthrown; and then they will say, 'Pretty prophet that Jonah! He is a man that cries "Wolf" when there is no wolf,' and I shall lose my reputation." Is there any servant of God here who is Afraid of Losing his Reputation?

This reason will not stand examination. My brother, that is a fear which does not trouble me. I have lost my reputation several times, and I would not go across the street to pick it up. Here am I tied to a work I cannot accomplish—pastor to more than five thousand people! A sheer impossibility! How can I watch over all your souls? If a reputation gets one into the position I now occupy, it certainly is not a blessing to be coveted. But if you have anything to do for Christ which will lose you the respect of good people, and yet you feel bound to do it, never give two thoughts to your reputation; for, if you do, it is already gone in that secret place where you should most of all cherish it. The highest reputation in the world is to be faithful—faithful to God and your own conscience. As to the approbation of the unconverted multitude, or of worldly professors, do not care the turn of a button for it; it may be a deadly heritage. I think that there was a little of regard for reputation in Jonah; possibly a great deal.

But still there was a higher and though even that was a bad one; for anything is bad however true and excellent in itself, that leads a man to run contrary to God's mind. It was this. He thought that the character of God himself would suffer; for if he went down to Nineveh and proclaimed, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown," then the people might repent, and Jehovah would suffer them to live; and then, after a while, the people would say, "Who is Jehovah? His word does not stand fast. He does not carry out his judgments." That, I think, was the great fear that lay in the heart of Jonah; for he said to God, when God had spared the city, "I pray thee, O Lord, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil."

I have given too much time to these excuses of Jonah. If you have any excuses for not doing what you ought to do, turn them out of doors, and never let them in again. Away with them! Away with them! You need not even take the trouble to repeat them to yourselves, or to judge their comparative value; they are all mischievous. If you are a servant of God, obey him at once without question. Now I come to the text. Jonah desired to go away from his prophetic work by journeying to the out-of-the-way place called Tarshish; and when he came to Joppa, which was the port of Jerusalem, he found a vessel bound for the place which he desired to reach. May we be taught of the Holy Spirit certain practical truths from this incident! I would teach you four things.

I. The first is, that

We May Not Follow our Impulses

to do wrong. Jonah felt it come upon him, all of a sudden, not to go to Nineveh, but to Tarshish. "Tarshish! Tarshish!" was constantly whispered in his ear, till he had Tarshish on the brain, and go he must. Now, I very commonly meet with persons who say, "I felt that I must do so and so. It came upon me that I must do so and so." I am afraid of these impulses—very greatly afraid of them. People may do right under their power, but they will spoil what they do by doing it out of mere impulse, and not because the action was right in itself. People far oftener do very wrong under the impulse, and I feel it needful to give a warning to any here who are prone to be so led. You must never obey an impulse to do wrong.

Now it may be that the impulse is to do a very brave thing. To go to Tarshish was a daring act. Jews never took well to seafaring. They were a land-loving people. Will Jonah go in a ship? We, nowadays, think little of it; but the Hebrews thought it a very terrible ordeal to go upon the sea. And then, to go to Tarshish—to the utmost ends of the earth: who but the men of Tyre would venture so far? These Hebrews did not know what kind of a place Tarshish was; but Jonah is bold to go. Some of you who are now in the Tabernacle ought to be on the Congo, or in North Africa, or in India, or in China; but you do not go from want of courage. Yet, you see, men are bold enough when bent on going wrong. They will take great leaps in the dark; whereas others are afraid to follow the right along a far safer way.

A Duty Laid Home.

It seemed also that he might have claimed liberty in the matter. Surely he might go to Tarshish if he liked. It is true he was a prophet; but could he not quit the service if he wished? Does God turn men into slaves that they may serve him? Surely, a prophet may make an excursion, and take a holiday! If he did not feel happy in going to Nineveh, was it right for him to go? Have you never met with this form of argument? I have heard people speak about sacred duties in this style. I have heard persons say, "No doubt it is in the Word of God; but I have never felt it laid home to me." What a wicked thing to say! If I had a boy, and I gave him a command, and he told me that he did not feel it "laid home," and therefore should not obey me, I think I should take care to lay it home very soon in a way which he might not appreciate. I believe that when Christian people trifle with known duties, their heavenly Father will soon find a rod to fit their backs. The Lord has given you liberty; not liberty to sin, but liberty to obey. Never talk Freedom to do Wrong.

It is a most horrible thing for one to say, "God loves us to be free in our service of him; and therefore I shall not serve him, but follow my own impulses."

This pretence of impulses is what none of us would allow to be an excuse if it were made the rule of conduct towards ourselves. If any person had an impulse to knock us down, we would not see the propriety of it. If he had an impulse to rob us, we should feel an impulse to call in a constable. If any man had an impulse to wrong us, we should appeal to the law for protection. In the same way, if we feel an inward incitement to do what we ought not to do, let us not be so silly and so wicked as to imagine that the law will be relaxed because of the evil movements of our mind. I think it needful to take this text and speak in this way, because I have seen several examples of men following, not the Word of God, not the law of righteousness, but some idle movements of their own mind, to which they attached an authority which did not belong to them.

Choosing the Easiest Course.

II. My second remark is this: We may not take a wrong course because it seems easy. Jonah says, "I will go to Tarshish." And he goes down to the port of Joppa, and there he finds a ship just going to Tarshish. Remember that the way of destruction is always easy. "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, and many there be which go in thereat." The way to hell is downhill; and this is easy travelling. Because it seems easy, natural, and almost inevitable for you to go along a certain questionable road, do not therefore dream that this gives you a license to follow it. You have reason to suspect a course in life in which there is no difficulty; for righteousness is by no means an easy thing.

Do not, I pray you, fall into the delusion that, because an evil act looks to be the next thing, the inevitable thing, therefore you may do it. The law is not, "Do the easiest thing," or some would be very virtuous. Would you excuse other people for injuring you on the ground that it was easy to do so? Somebody in your house pilfers, robs you of your trinkets or your cash; but you do not accept the excuse that such things were so readily got at, that it was natural the thief to take them. A man only opens his mouth and takes away your character: is the use of slander an excuse for it? A person gives your name to a cheque, and gets the money for it: is it a valid excuse when he says, "I have a great facility in imitating handwriting: forgery is very simple and remunerative, and you can hardly blame me for trying it on"? No, friends, you denounce the thief, the slanderer, the forger; and even so will you be denounced if you fall into this sin.

III. Now, we will go a step further. We may Never Plead Providential Arrangement as an excuse for doing wrong. There could hardly ever be a more remarkable instance of apparently providential co-operation than we have here. Jonah wants to go to Tarshish; and having selected that place as the region of his hiding, he must needs go down to Joppa, on the Mediterranean Sea. He walks on the quay, and the first thing he sees is a ship going to Tarshish! Is not that a providence? This is often used as a cover for wicked actions. "I could not do otherwise," says one; "providence seemed to point in that way. I should have been flying in the face of God if I had not done as I have done." Ah, me! how base is man, to seek to saddle his sin upon God! How grossly he deceives himself!

If Jonah was so persuaded, he was soon cured of his error. Two or three hours after, when they awoke Jonah from his sleep in the sides of the ship, and he saw that awful storm, did he then consider that a gracious providence had led him into that tremendous tempest? He soon wished himself anywhere else than on the great sea. When they were about to throw him out to the fishes, he did not say much about providence; he was too much

Convinced of his Own Folly to blame his God. I have seen some man in trade doing certain tricky things, and he has tried to make it out that the circumstances compelled him thereto. "Such and such a person walked in just at the nick of time, and said certain things, and another event occurred so remarkably pat to the case, that it all looked like a providential arrangement; and everyone who saw it would have thought so." Nonsense; nothing can make it right to do wrong. I pray you, never blaspheme God by laying your sins on the back of his providence. This is an act of daring presumption and profanity. You will never see a providence more remarkable than that which occurred to Jonah; and yet Jonah, for all that, was rebelling against the Lord in going down to Tarshish. Providence or no providence, the Word of the Lord is to be our guide, and we must not depart from it under pretext of necessity or circumstances. It is very Easy to Make Up a Providence when you want to do so. If you sit down and try to find in the ways of God to you an excuse for the wrong which you mean to commit, the crafty devil and your deceitful heart together will soon conjure up a plea for providence. The man who shot another in malice might say that providence led him to carry his gun that morning; the burglar providentially met with a companion, who wished to relieve a householder of his spare plate; the petty pilferer saw goods lying unprotected near a tradesman's door, and they providentially happened to be exactly what he wanted. It will not do. The pretence is too barefaced. Yet I fear that many, who think themselves Christians, are deluded by this wicked argument.

Such a method of reasoning would have led many into sin who are famous in history for their virtue. The three holy children would have escaped the fire, and Daniel would never have been in the lion's den, if they had been guided by what men call providences. Look at David. He is brought by Abishai upon the field at night. There lies king Saul, sound asleep; and Abishai says to David, "God hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day: now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time!" What a providence, was it not?

The cruel foe was altogether in David's hands, and the executioner was eager to settle all further conflict by one fatal stroke! What could be clearer or simpler? Wonderful providence! Yet David never said a word as to providence, but replied, "Destroy him not: for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guiltless?" He therefore came away, and left the king sleeping as he was. He would not follow opportunities, but would keep to the law of his God. I pray you, do the same; and if ever everything seems to lead up to wrong-doing, and many circumstances unite to steer you in that direction, do not yield to them. Your guide in life is not a so-called providence, but an unquestionable precept of the Lord. Do as God bids you, and do it at once.

IV. We may not excuse ourselves by The Lawfulness of an Act in itself. What is right in another may not be right in me. That which another might do without offence, may be a grievous wrong in a child of God. For the mariners to go to Tarshish was right enough. Yes, my dear friends, it may be quite right for certain persons to pursue a course which you must not even think of. For the Tyrian sailors to go to Tarshish was their business, their calling, their duty; but it was very different with the prophet. It was not Jonah's business, calling or duty; why should he go to Tarshish? Two men may do the same thing, and the one may be improving his grace by doing it, and the other may be increasing his damnation by doing it. After all, it is the motive that must rule our judgment of the action. Beware of defending your transgression from the fact that others may do it without being censured.

But might not Jonah be allowed to go to Tarshish if he wished? Yes, it might, under certain circumstances, have been right for Jonah. When he was off duty, it might have been good for his health for him to go to Tarshish; but it must not be so when God says to him, "Go to Nineveh." You may not do that which is contrary to the Lord's will, even though, in itself, the action may be innocent. We may not say, "I have a right to do it." We have no right to do otherwise than as the Lord commands. We have No Right to do Wrong; and the more God loves us, and the more sure we are that we are his children, the more are we bound to follow closely in the way of truth and holiness. We are not saved by works; but because we are even now saved, we desire, in all our ways, to glorify him who has saved us by his most precious blood.

Thus have I shown you that there is teaching in the incident at Joppa. I think it is legitimate teaching, from the fact that, when Jonah wanted to do evil, everything seemed ready to his hand; and yet he was doing grievously wrong. May this warning be useful to some of you by God's grace! I do not know for whom this sermon is meant, but I have felt bound in spirit to deliver it. It is intended as a warning for somebody who is hearing it, or shall hereafter read it. Perhaps some dozen or two may find it applicable to their cases, and, if it comes home to your consciences, I charge you, by the living God, do not turn a deaf ear to it.

O man of God, run not away from your work! O sinner, lust not after vain and empty pleasure! Child of God, come back to him from whom your heart has wandered, and, henceforth, by his grace, be diligently his servant to the end. Sinner, thou that hast gone far away from peace and hope, hear thou the heavenly voice to-night which warns thee of thy danger. Cry, "I will arise, and go to my Father." He will come to meet you. On your neck he will fall. He will kiss you, wash you, clothe you, save you, and you shall praise him world without end. Happy, indeed, shall I be if I have taught some souls to give up their dissembling and excuse-making, and if I have persuaded them to make full confession of sin before the Lord Jesus, who will wash them till they are without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

LET us first see what a submarine cable is, and how it is made. To do this a visit must be made to the enormous factory on the banks of the Thames, a few miles below London. Here the birth of the cable may be traced through shop after shop, machine after machine. The foundation of all is the conductor, a strand of seven fine copper wires. This slender copper cord is first drawn through a mass of sticky black compound, which causes the thin coating of gutta-percha applied by the next machine to adhere to it perfectly, and prevents the retention of any bubbles of air in the interstices between the strands, or between the conductor and the gutta-percha envelope. One envelope is not sufficient, however, but the full thickness of insulating material has to be attained by four more alternate coatings of sticky compound and plastic gutta-percha. The conductor is now insulated and has developed into "core." Before going any further, the core is coiled into tanks filled with water and tested in order to ascertain whether it is electrically perfect, that is that there is no undue leakage of electricity through the gutta-percha insulating envelope. After the core has been all tested and passed, the manufacture of the cable goes on. The core travels through another set of machines, which first wrap it with a thick coating of tarred jute, and then with a compact armoring of iron or steel wires, of varying thickness according to the depth of water in which the cable is to be laid. Above the armoring, in order to preserve the iron from rust as long as possible, is applied a covering of stout canvas tape thoroughly impregnated with a pitch-like compound, and sometimes the wires composing the armor are separately covered with Russian hemp as an additional preservative against corrosion. The completed cable is coiled into large circular store-tanks, where it is kept for some time submerged in water and again subjected to an exhaustive series of electrical tests.

The Shipment of the Cable

Next claims attention. The cable steamer is lying at her moorings some distance out in the river taking in her priceless cargo. It is safe to say that the loading of no other ship presents such a curious and interesting scene. The cable is undulating in the air like an enormous eel as it emerges from the factory on the river bank, and travels on guides, mounted on tall, floating frames, until it reaches the ship's side, over which it glides and immediately dives down into the dark recesses of the hold, where a gang of men are busy coiling it away at the rate of four or five miles an hour, into one of the four iron tanks with which the ship is provided.

Paying Out.

During the operation of landing the shore-end, communication was maintained between the party on shore and those on board by means of flag-signalling, a small hand-flag being used to send messages in the Morse code. As soon as there was enough cable on the beach to reach to the site selected for the cable-hut, "Enough cable on shore," was signaled to the ship, and paying out was at once stopped. All being made fast on shore we weighed anchor and set out slowly toward the open sea. The cable needed no steam power to help it out of the ship; on the contrary, it ran out freely of its own accord, and it was necessary to apply the brakes to the paying-out drum to prevent the cable running out too fast. It was astonishing to see the great heavy iron-bound cable, a single yard of which would weigh over ten pounds, come swishing around the tank, up on deck and over pulleys and guides, take four or five turns round a drum, six feet in diameter, bob under the dynamometer, and up over the stern-sheave, and finally dive into the water with all the ease and pliability with which a silken cord might go through the same performance. One striking thing in cable operations is the hearty will with which every one works and the extreme anxiety evidenced on all sides for the welfare and safety of the cable. I have seen the engineer-in-chief, during the landing of a shore-end, up to his waist in the surf, cutting the lashings which secured the balloon buoys to the cable; and on another occasion, when the ship being hove to, the cable had got foul of the propeller, the chief of the expedition, after passing word to the engineers not to move the engines, took a header into the water, and, holding on to a blade of the propeller, succeeded in freeing the cable, to the great relief of every one on board, as all efforts from above had failed to dislodge it and a rupture seemed unavoidable.

THE PALACE OF CHARLOTTENBURG.

THE interesting ceremony, briefly chronicled in this journal last week, adds another pleasant association to the history of the famous palace, a picture of which is here given. The Princess Victoria, sister of the Emperor, was married there on November 19, to Prince Adolph of Schaumburg-Lippe. It is now the home of her mother, the ex-Empress Frederick, who is the eldest daughter of the Queen of England. It is situated in the western suburb of Berlin, where also is the new Imperial Mausoleum in which the remains of Emperors William I. and Frederick III., and the heroic Queen Louise are deposited. The palace was built by the Electress Sophia Charlotte in 1696, and greatly enlarged by Frederick the Great, and visitors are still shown the rooms he used to occupy there. On the north and east are extensive woods and grounds well laid out. Close at hand are extensive barracks, and around the castle has grown up a thriving little town of 12,000 inhabitants. The castle has a melancholy association with the illness of the late Emperor Frederick "the Noble," who spent there those terrible weeks during which the fatal nature of his malady was making itself known. His daughter, who has just been married, is reported to have been most assiduous in helping her devoted mother in nursing him and relieving the tedium of his confinements to the Palace. She is now twenty-four years of age and is said to be a scholar of no small attainments, besides being familiar with all the details of household work, which her father and mother insisted on her learning.

AN UNEXPECTED PROTECTOR.

It is related of that eminent preacher and saint, the late Rev. Robert Newton, D.D., whom some of our oldest readers will remember as an honored visitor to this country, that his path of duty being through a district where he had enemies who intended personal violence to him, he committed himself to the care of God and departed to the performance of his allotted work. As he entered the place where mischief was threatened him, he found walking at his side a huge dog, the sight of which was an effective warning against molestation. His unknown companion kept closely by him all the way through the enemy's country, but disappeared as suddenly and mysteriously as he had come, when the chances of injury were past. Dr. Newton was far from being a superstitious man. He did not fail to recognize, however, in the presence of his magnificent companion a defender of God's providing. The promises: "He will keep the feet of His saints," "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in," were literally fulfilled in this singular providence.

A FORECLOSURE AVERTED.

A READER of this journal writes: "It may encourage some of your readers to take their troubles to the Lord, if I relate a recent experience. A few evenings ago my husband and I were in great trouble. It is not his custom to tell me his business affairs but this difficulty was so serious that he talked with me about it. Our farm has a mortgage on it, which we supposed would remain some years yet, until we could save enough to pay it off, if the interest was paid punctually, as we have always done. But the money was called in. My husband showed me the letter, which said that the money must be paid immediately or foreclosure proceedings would be commenced at once. I kept the letter and after my husband had gone to the city, I did as Hezekiah did with his letter—I spread it out before the Lord and prayed about it. I cannot tell you exactly how I felt, but somehow I arose from my knees with the conviction that in some way the Lord would take care of it. There was no clear ground for any such conclusion, the way was as dark as before. We had not the money; we knew no way of getting it; and the threatening letter still stood; yet I did believe that there would be no foreclosure. And so it turned out. That night when my husband returned from the city, his face was radiant. 'That mortgage matter is all right,' he said, 'the people are willing to wait. So in my experience the promise was fulfilled: "Commit thy way unto the Lord: trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass."' (Ps. 37: 5.)

THE town of Tiberias on the shores of Lake Galilee is believed to occupy the site of the ancient Rakkath, which Joshua mentions (Joshua 9: 35), among the "fenced cities," of the tribe of Naphtali. It attained its chief importance under Herod Antipas, who is said to have rebuilt it and named it in honor of the Emperor Tiberius. Herod had passed most of his life in Italy, and brought with him a taste for magnificent buildings which he gratified in this new town, which he made the seat of his government.

Among its buildings was a stadium like the one in Rome in which the youth of the country were trained in athletic and warlike exercises. Herod also built a palace there and decorated it, as Josephus mentions with horror with figures of animals, contrary to Jewish law.

No mention is made of Jesus ever visiting the town, though much of his time during the three years of his ministry was spent almost within sight of it. An inference from John 6: 1, would lead us to suppose that he had been there, but it is vague and indirect. The fact that it was the residence of the man who had cast John the Baptist into prison, and subsequently killed him to gratify the caprice of a wicked woman, may have caused Jesus to avoid the town. That tragedy probably took place in Tiberias. The statement made by Luke (23: 8) that Herod was exceedingly glad when he saw Jesus having been desirous of seeing him of a long season, would imply that he had never seen him until Jesus was brought before him a prisoner.

The town, though still beautifully situated between the hills and the lake, has none of ancient glory architecture. The little that remained to this century was destroyed in the earthquake which on January 1, 1837, levelled nearly every edifice in the town, and buried seven hundred persons in the ruins. Its present population is little more than three thousand, and one-fourth of whom are Jews. They regard it as a sacred city, one of the four in which prayer must be continually offered or the earth would revert to its original chaos. The other three are Jerusalem, Hebron and Safed. They have also a tradition that the Messiah will show himself there, and be enthroned at Safed on the highest mountain in Galilee. It was in Tiberias that the Hebrew Rabbi Judah Tak-Koresh, in A. D. 190, compiled the Mishna, or code of Jewish laws, which is the standard of appeal among modern Jews.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

THE Richard Mansford whom we know as the tenant of the "Hermitage" at Settleworth, and who as we saw, witnessed the flight of Nora from Gerald Towneley, Esq., was in many respects a different man to the pushing and prosperous master of Ooramarra Farm, in Australia. His hair, which at the time we first met him scarce showed a shred of grey, was now close approaching white. It had begun to turn rapidly on that never-to-be-forgotten day when his convict brother Rupert had revealed himself to him. Then followed the night attack, and his wound, and more than anything, perhaps, the changes that he found on every hand in and about his old home.

During the homeward voyage, too, he had had time for thought, and this resulted in a greater change in him still. He could not free himself from sorrowful thoughts about his brother's sad end and sadder life. He felt that though he had suffered cruel wrong at his hands, yet Rupert was his only brother, the companion of his boyhood and youth, and now he was lying in an uncared-for convict's grave—No. 240!

He could not help asking himself how far his own conduct had been wise and good in going away into unknown exile, breaking every link that bound him to his home—a break that was partly answerable for Rupert's subsequent downward career. His conscience condemned him, he felt that in truth he should have been his brother's keeper, though he had wronged him.

Then, too, he felt bitterly, sternly rebuked that he had deserted Anice. He had always felt that she had fallen from him greatly through his own fault, but now was the first time he had admitted it even to himself. Rupert was a fascinating lad (and perhaps he hadn't meant to go so far), it should have been his duty to have held her, not only by his love—God knows that was deep enough—but by outward manifestations of it, that she could have felt more fully.

Then came upon him a spirit of heart-breaking foreboding. He had come to find her, and if need be succor her; but, what if she were dead, passed beyond his aid. The thought overwhelmed him, and drove him to his knees. Richard Mansford had been all his life a good man, and knew the power of prayer to a degree, and yet he had never prayed, never emptied himself before God, because he had never fully realized that, good as he really was, yet he needed the forgiveness of God as much as the vilest. Now his utter unworthiness came upon him as a flood, and in his cabin on the Southern Cross, he poured out his soul before God.

When he rose his soul was at peace. He felt convinced that he should never again see Anice in the flesh, but the heart-break had passed. God knoweth best. He was altogether a new man, a gentler spirit, and carried within his breast a chastened heart that, feeling too much its own sin, could no longer afford to sit in judgment on the conduct of others.

As my readers already know, he prosecuted his search for Anice or her children, and finally established himself in the "Hermitage" with honest Phelim for his serving man, having tracked his niece, Nora, to her home at Settleworth.

The bonnie face of his niece, which carried in it familiar dream faces now of Anice and anon of Rupe, took that citadel of his heart by storm, and his whole being went out towards her. Thanks, however, to mean and slanderous tongues of which there is always a terrible overplenty, Richard had heard the name of his niece coupled with that of Gerald Towneley, whom he had soon discovered to be all that he looked upon as undesirable and unworthy, and in his ignorance of the true facts of the case, he mourned that she should allow the young rogue to dangle about her, though his course of life was pretty widely known. This induced him to still lie quiet a little that he might the better understand her, and moreover, he perhaps felt called on to play the part of Providence, the result of which, far from what he desired, caused much unnecessary pain and trouble to his niece.

It was at this period that the maiden in question was much beset by the unwelcome attentions of Gerald Towneley, and more than once or twice the unknown occupant of the "Hermitage" had seen the two together, and like a good many others had come too readily to his own conclusions, and they gave him serious pain of mind.

On one such occasion he returned home with this suspicion strong upon him, and quick-sighted Phelim Magrath soon discovered that something had gone wrong with his master. With the boldness which was the result of long familiarity between master and man, peculiar to life in the bush, he said:

"Savin' your presence, sur. I'm thinkin' you must ha' seen a ghost outside the Hermitage."

"Why, Phelim, my dear fellow, what makes you think so?" inquired his master, listlessly.

"Because yer hanher looks as scared as the riptiles when the blessed Saint Patrick tould 'em to lave ould Ireland, an' nivver a wan o' 'em had so much as a plank to sail on. Let me get you a—"

"No, thank you. The fact is, I have seen something that has disturbed me a good deal. Lock up, and let us turn in," said the master.

The Irishman stood irresolute. His master's trouble was ever his own, and he would fain have said a word of cheer. "Well, good-night, sur," said he; "an' shure it may do you good to remember the old saying, 'No eyes are best in the dark; for the blind man can't be desaved by shadows.'"

So saying, honest Phelim retired for the night.

"I was not 'desaved,'" said Richard Mansford to himself, "I wish I had been." And yet the Irishman's old saying is well worth taking into account by those who make their observations in the dark.

Richard Mansford was not the only watchful observer of Gerald Towneley's effort to become acquainted with Nora. On the evening of that interview which George interrupted, Nora's agitation did not escape the eye of Tabitha Crowle when Nora arrived breathless at her uncle's door.

"Why, lawky me, dear lassie, whcrever ha' ye been, and what's fluttered your dear heart like that?" Such was the greeting of Tabitha, as Nora doffed her hat and shawl, and flung herself into a chair.

"Oh, I've had such a long walk, and am so tired," said Nora, in a way which she hoped might preclude the necessity of further inquiry or explanation; but in this she reckoned without her host, or, rather, without Tabitha Crowle. That brisk and sensible Abigail was too discerning, and her honest love for the orphan girl too genuine to permit her easily to be deceived.

"Nay, bairn," she said, "there is no need to tell me no more than you feel inclined to. I've no call to interfere, but it's as plain as a pike-staff that something or somebody's bothered you, and I'd a good deal sooner they bothered me. I'd settle 'em, I would. But there, I've no right to meddle."

This, of course, tender-hearted Nora could not withstand. So she gave Tabitha the kiss of confidence and peace, and straightway told her how she had been entranced by the song of the thrush, and how she was belated in the grove, how Gerald Towneley pressed his attention upon her, and how George's timely interference had set her free to run home as fast as she could, "and—and—that's all Tabitha," she concluded, with a few unbidden tears.

"Ah, is it, dear lassie? and plenty, too, I think," said the sympathetic housekeeper. "But you don't mean to say that you ran away from our George; he would have taken care of you. I'm sure he would."

Nora did not doubt that, but she was not quite sure what the taking care might have included.

It will be noticed that Tabitha Crowle spoke of the young carpenter as "our George." She not only looked upon him as a vital part of the establishment, but honored him with a full measure of respect. More than once it had crossed her mind of late that Nora and he would make a capital pair, "if so be as they could be brought together," as she put it; though it did appear to her at times as though George, excellent as he was, was scarcely good enough to mate with her favorite, who was almost too good for anybody.

Now, however, she set herself to fish for facts. She even wept so far, for a passing moment, as to picture her as a member of the Towneley family. If he was rich and did belong to a family of great gentleness, why, Nora, God bless her, came of gentleness, too; for the Mansfords used to lift their heads quite as high as the Towneleys, and though their purse was never so long yet their blood was quite as blue. As to the matter of riches, why, Nora would be none so ill off when her uncle died, for she was sure of all he had—anyhow she was as good as gold and, in fact, the only genuine trouble was that he, Gerald Towneley, Esq., wasn't.

The young gentleman was evidently very much in earnest in his pursuit whether his motive was good or bad. He became a frequent visitor to Abram Hardale's establishment. All sorts of trifling matters were ordered in the way of business; all sorts of work needed to be done either at the Hall or at one or other of its outlying dependencies, and nothing would ever do but George Appleton must be the workman, who was told off to attend to them. On such occasions Mr. Gerald Towneley, as George discovered was generally at the carpenter's shop, and was often in the house itself for a drink of Tabitha Crowle's "delicious butter-milk;" though how he came to know that she had a specialty in that line it would be difficult to say.

That brisk and comely dame had come to have a more favorable opinion of the handsome young gentleman who seemed so fond of Nora, and she felt strongly inclined to aid him in his suit. His captivating graces and winsome tongue had more than half enlisted her on his side: and the way in which he deprecated her anger in the matter of the kiss he had stolen from her own rosy lips, had impressed her with his kind and forgiving spirit, remembering how she had made his cheeks rosier than they had been for many a day. She had even gone so far as to give her opinion to George Appleton that the young squire was honestly in love with Nora, and that it would be a great unkindness to the girl to prevent her making so excellent a match.

"It doesn't need a Solomon," she said, "to see that he's head over ears in love with Miss Nora, and that he worships the very ground she treads on." That very night, Nora Mansford stole into her uncle's house like a thief, passing upstairs so silently as to be unnoticed either by the old carpenter or by Tabitha Crowle, neither of whom had retired to rest.

Quietly and noiselessly the girl bolted her door, and then flung herself upon her bed without undressing, and sobbed and wept in a very abandonment of misery and as if her heart would surely break.

The lonely and tedious hours of the night passed slowly by, and still she wept, and sighed, and turned herself upon her bed as one utterly distracted with grief, wailing ever and anon—

"O God, I am a-weary
I wish that I were dead."

When the first grey dawning of the morning cast its cold glimmer on the window-panes, she fell into a fitful and unrefreshing doze, from which she was awakened by her own involuntary moanings, exclaiming: "It cannot be! Oh, it's too terrible! O mother! mother! whatever shall I do?"

At length she arose from her sorrow-smitten and restless couch; and bathed her flushed face and aching brow with cold water; changed her dress, smoothed as well as she could her dark disheveled hair, and went downstairs to assist Tabitha and the apprentice lad in the usual morning duties of the establishment.

"Why, whatever's the matter with you, lassie?" said honest, hearty Tabitha in sympathetic tones, for Nora's pallid face, and the big black rings around her sunken eyes were index clear enough, and made evasion vain. "You look as if you had never been in bed. You are better there than up, I'm thinkin'. Go back, my darlin', and I'll bring you a cup o' tea."

"Oh, no, thank you, Tabitha. I've had a bad night, but I shall be better directly," she replied, but even as she spoke she had to lay hold upon the table to keep herself from falling.

"Come, Miss," said down-right Tabitha, taking her by the shoulder, and wheeling her gently round to the foot of the stairs. "If you don't go this minute I shall carry you, and that you'll see."

Nora felt herself quite unable to resist, and feeling thoroughly ill in mind, she suffered herself to be conducted back to her chamber.

Tabitha undressed her as if she had been a little child, and having fairly put her into bed, she smoothed the coverlet over her, saying, "There, now, try to get a bit o' sleep; then you'll be better. I expect you'll have a visitor this morning, an'—"

"No, no, no," exclaimed the maiden, covering her face with her two hands, and beginning to sob hysterically, "I must never, never—"

"Hush, dearie, hush!" said Tabitha, and then wisely enough she kissed the white lips of the suffering girl, and quietly left the room, carefully closing the door behind her. Tabitha Crowle resumed her duties, but her heart was sad for her young favorite, and she greatly wondered what was amiss.

"If that there Mr. Gerald Towneley has been up to any hanky-panky trick, I'll give him a taste o' the mop handle, as sure as my name's Tabitha Crowle!"

From this it will be seen that the good-hearted house-keeper was far from being certain of that young gentleman's good faith. Of one thing I am certain, however, namely, that the mop-handle would be called into requisition if in the least degree she found that her darling had suffered any harm.

What is Scrofula

It is that impurity in the blood, which, accumulating in the glands of the neck, produces slightly lumps or swellings; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, causing blindness or deafness; which is the cause of pimples, cancerous growths, or many other manifestations usually ascribed to "humors." It is a more formidable enemy than consumption or cancer alone, for scrofula combines the possible features of both. Being the most ancient it is the most general of all diseases or affections for very few persons are entirely free from it.

How can it be cured? By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the cures it has accomplished often when other medicines have failed, proven itself to be a potent and peculiar remedy for this disease. For all affections of the blood Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled, and some cures it has effected are really wonderful. If you suffer from scrofula in any of its various forms be sure to give Hood's Sarsaparilla a trial.

FIFTY TIMES IN PRISON.

ED British convert, named Gipsy, relates the following: "On one occasion in the open air preaching, and spoke to a man about his soul. As I addressed him, he turned to me and said, 'use your speaking to me. I have been in prison fifty times. Do not tell me of his salvation, for there is none and with an angry scowl he turned away. Laying my hand upon his shoulder, I gently said, 'Not so fast, my friend, and then I told him the good news, and showed him that it was true, though he had been in prison all his life. Though his sins were as scarlet, I would make them 'white as snow.' At first the gloomy face brightened, and he looked at me with interest. I then told him of the finished work of salvation on Christ's finished cross, and holding out his hand to me as I said, 'I will trust him.' In his example and words made a deep impression on his three sons, and they were induced to follow in the steps of their father and come to Christ. Long after the daughter made her heart glad by completing the work of Christ. When I visited the household, who had long been an earnest worker, said, 'Before this great change there was not room at the breakfast table for my husband and our three children; they were continually quarreling, a day of peace; but now what a peace; all are quiet and happy.' Yes, and change is soon evident in the life, and Christianity becomes a gain and joy to ourselves and all us."

PIOUS ANIMAL PAINTER.

A famous English painter of animals, Sidney Cooper, now nearly ninety years of age, has just published two very interesting volumes of reminiscences. The words of the volumes offer a pious message: "I feel that I have risen to distinction, and that I have a name no gold could purchase and no enemy could allenate. I have, moreover, peace in the better knowledge of my life, and grace which will comfort me in the rest of my life; as well as trust, which will bear me through the dark valley of my time comes, and the blessed assurance that there is a glorious immortal life that I shall one day see him as he is."

THE SEA OF GALILEE.

BY REV. S. DRYDEN PHELPS, D.D.

Dear, beautiful sight! Embosomed by hills,
How calmly reposes the Lake!
I gaze, and my soul with rapture thrills,
As the glorious scene my vision fills,
And holiest memories wake.
O lovely Sea
Of Galilee,
How oft my Redeemer hath looked on thee!

All other lakes in all lands are denied
The honors that thou dost know:
Blossoms as radiant may fringe their side,
Fountains as sparkling may swell their tide,
But thou hast the Jordan's inflow;
More sacred yet,
Gennesaret,
The sandals of Christ thy waves have wet!

How oft I have come, in wondering thought,
A pilgrim along thy shore,
Beholding the crowds that Jesus taught,
And the deeds His power and mercy wrought
As He walked thy margin o'er.
O hallowed Sea
Of Galilee,
The home of Messiah was once by thee!

And now, with thankfullest heart, I stand Where Jesus so often stood;
I see the same stream, and rock, and land;
The same sweet Tabor, and Hermon grand,
And look on the same bright flood—Tiberian Sea,
So dear to me,
Because my Saviour saw these and thee!

My feet have pressed the old paths He trod,
And crossed o'er the same clear rills;
I have sat me down on the grassy sod,
Where rested the weary Son of God,
Who bore our sorrows and ills.
In thee I take,
Gennesareth Lake,
Unbounded delight for His dear sake!

Nazareth's valley and hills are fair,
And lovely is Bethlehem;
Mount Olivet's scenes their glories share,
In the Garden shade and Bethany there,
With precious Jerusalem;
But, dearest Sea
Of Galilee,
How the life of my Lord is linked with thee.

No crowds along thy thoroughfares pour;
Silence and ruin are here to-day;
White sails on thy waves are seen no more;
The cities that flourished upon thy shore
Have passed in their guilt away;
But thou art yet,
Gennesaret,
A picture unchanged in thy hill frame set!

And Christ is the same, though ascended on high,
As when by this water He trod;
With the same tender heart, and pitying eye;
As mighty to save, as lovingly nigh—
O ever the same Lamb of God!
Adieu, sweet Sea
Of Galilee;
Thy image remains, and thy Lord, with me!

"As he journeyed he came near Damascus." Acts 9:3.

Palestine we spent last night in a mud hovel of one story, but camels and sheep in the basement. Yet never did the most brilliant hotel on any continent seem so attractive to me as that structure. If we had been obliged to stay in tent, as we expected to do that night, we must have perished. A violent storm had opened upon us its volleys of hail, and snow, and rain, and wind, as if to let us know what the Bible means when prophet, and evangelist, and Christ himself spoke of the fury of the elements. The atmospheric wrath broke upon us about one o'clock in the afternoon and we were until night exposed to it. With hands and feet benumbed, and our bodies chilled to the bone, we made our slow way. While high up on the rocks, and the gale blowing the hardest, a signal of distress halted the party, for down in the ravines one of the horses had fallen, and his rider must not be left alone amid that wildness of scenery and horror of storm. As the night approached, the tempest thickened, and blackened, and strengthened. Some of our attendants going ahead had gained permission for us to halt for the night in the mud hovel I speak of. Our first duty on arrival, was the resuscitation of the exhausted of our party. My room was without a window, and an iron stove without any top, in the centre of the room, the smoke selecting my eyes in the absence of a chimney. Through an opening in the floor, Arab faces were several times thrust up to see how I was progressing. But the tempest ceased during the night and before it was fully day we were feeling for the stirrups of our saddled horses, this being the day whose long march will bring us to that city, whose name cannot be pronounced in the hearing of the intelligent or the Christian without making the blood to tingle and the nerves to thrill, and putting the best emotions of the soul into agitation—Damascus!

During the day we passed Cæsarea Philippi, the northern terminus of Christ's journeyings. North of that he never went. We lunch at noon, seated on the fallen columns of one of Herod's palaces.

At four o'clock in the afternoon, coming to a hill-top, we saw on the broad plain a city, which the most famous camel-driver of all time, afterward called Mohammed, the prophet and the founder of the most stupendous system of error that has ever cursed the earth, refused to enter because he said God would allow man to enter but one paradise and he would not enter this earthly paradise lest he should be denied entrance to the heavenly. But no city that I ever saw so plays hide and seek with the traveller. The air is so clear the distant objects seem close by. You come on the top of a hill and Damascus seems only a little way off. But down you go into a valley and you see nothing for the next half hour but barrenness and rocks regurgitated by the volcanoes of other ages. Up another hill and down again. Up again and down again. But after your patience is almost exhausted you reach the last hill-top and the city of Damascus, the oldest city under the whole heavens, and built by Noah's grandson, grows upon your vision. Every mile of the journey now becomes more solemn and suggestive and tremendous.

This is the very road, for it has been the only road for thousands of years, the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, along which a cavalcade of mounted officers went, about 1854 years ago, in the midst of them a fierce little man who made up by magnitude of hatred for Christianity for his diminutive stature, and was the leading spirit and, though suffering from chronic inflammation of the eyes, from those eyes flashed more indignation against Christ's followers than any one of

The Horsed Procession.

This man, before his name was changed to Paul, was called Saul. So many of the mightiest natures of all ages are condensed into smallness of stature. The Frenchman who was sometimes called by his troops "Old One Hundred Thousand," was often styled "Little Nap." Lord Nelson, with insignificant stature to start with, and one eye put out at Calvi and his right arm taken off at Teneriffe, proves himself at Trafalgar the mightiest hero of the English navy. The greatest of American theologians, Archibald Alexander, could stand under the elbow of many of his contemporaries. Look out for little men when they start out for some especial mission of good or evil. The thunderbolt is only a condensation of electricity.

Well, that galloping group of horsemen on the road to Damascus were halted quicker than bombshell or cavalry charge ever halted a regiment. The Syrian noonday, because of the clarity of the atmosphere is the brightest of the noondays and the noonday sun in Syria is positively terrific for brilliance. But suddenly that noon there flashed from the heavens light which made that Syrian sun seem tame as a star in comparison. It was the face of the slain and ascended Christ, looking from the heavens, and under the dash of all the horses dropped with their riders in the dust. And then two claps of thunder followed uttering the two words, the second word like the first: "Saul! Saul!" For three days the fallen equestrian was totally blind, for excessive light will sometimes extinguish the eye-sight. And what cornea and crystalline lens could endure a brightness greater than the noonday Syrian sun? I had read it a hundred times but it never so impressed me before and probably will never so impress me again, as I took my Bible from the saddle bags and read aloud to our comrades in travel: "As he journeyed, he came near Damascus and suddenly their shine round about him a light from heaven and he fell to the earth and heard a voice saying unto him, 'Saul! Saul! Why persecutest thou me?' and he said, 'Who art thou, Lord?' And the Lord said, 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest.'"

But we cannot stop longer on this road so we shall see this unhorsed equestrian later.

Damascus, toward which his horse's head is turned and at which we must ourselves arrive before night. The evening is near at hand, and as we leave snowy Hermon behind us and approach the shadow of the cupolas of two hundred mosques we cut through a circumference of many miles of garden which embower the city. So luxuriant are these gardens, so opulent in colors, so luscious of fruits, so glittering with fountains, so rich with bowers and kiosks that the Mohammedan's heaven, was fashioned after what are to be seen here of bloom and fruitage. Here in Damascus at the right season are cherries, and mulberries, and apricots, and almonds and pistachios, and pomegranates, and pears, and apples, and plums, and citrons, and all the richness of the round world's pomology. No wonder that Julian called this city "the Eye of the East," and that the poets of Syria have styled it "the lustre on the neck of doves," and historians said: "It is the golden clasp which couples the two sides of the world together."

Many travellers express disappointment with Damascus, but the trouble is they have carried on their minds from boyhood, the book which dazzles so many young people—the Arabian Nights, and they come into Damascus looking for Aladdin's lamp, and Aladdin's ring, and the genii which appeared by rubbing them. But as I have never read the Arabian Nights, such stuff not being allowed around our house in my boyhood, and nothing lighter in the way of reading than Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest and D'Aubigny's History of the Reformation, Damascus appeared to me as sacred and secular history have presented it, and so the city was not a disappointment, but with few exceptions a surprise.

Under my window to-night in the hotel at Damascus I hear the perpetual ripple and rust of the river Abana. Ah, the secret, is out. Now I know why all this flora, and fruit, and why everything is so green, and the plain one great emerald. The river Abana! And not far off, the river Pharpar, which our horses waded through to-day! Thank the rivers, or rather the d who made the rivers! Deserts to the north, deserts to the south, deserts to the east, deserts to the west, but here a paradise. And, as the rivers Gihon, and Pison, and Hiddekel, and Euphrates, made the other paradise, Abana and Pharpar make this Damascus a paradise. That what made General Naaman of this city of Damascus so mad when he was sent for the cure of his leprosy to go and wash in the river Jordan. The Jordan is much of the year a muddy stream and it is never so clear as this river Abana, that I hear rumbling under my window to-night nor as the waters of Pharpar that we crossed to-day. They are as clear as though they had been sieved through some especial sieve of the mountains. General Naaman had great and patriotic pride in these two rivers of his own country, and when Elisha the prophet told him that if he wanted to get rid of his leprosy, he must go and wash in the Jordan, he felt as we, who live on the magnificent Hudson would feel if told that we must go and wash in the muddy Thames, or as if those who live on the transparent Rhine, were told that they must go and wash in the muddy Tiber. So General Naaman cried out with a voice as loud as ever he had used in commanding his troops, uttering those memorable words, which every minister of the Gospel sooner or later takes for his text: "Are the waters of Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? May I not wash in them and be clean?" Thank God they live in a land with plenty of rivers, and that they bless all our Atlantic coast and all our Pacific coast, and reticulate all the continent between the coasts.

Only those who have travelled in the deserts of Syria, or Egypt, or have in the oriental cities heard the tinkling of the bells of those who draw water, can realize what it is to have the divine beverage in abundance. Water gurgling over the rocks, turning the mill-wheel, saturating the roots of the corn, dripping from the fountains, filling the cisterns of the household, rolling through the fountains or baptistries of holy ordinance, filling the reservoirs of cities, inviting the cattle to come down and slake their thirst and the birds of heaven to dip their wings, ascending in the mists and falling again in benediction of shower — water, living water, God-given water!

We are awakened in the morning in Damascus by the song of those who have different styles of food to sell. It is not a street cry as in London or New York, but a weird, and long drawn-out solo, compared with which a buzz-saw is musical. It makes you inopportunistly waken, and will not let you sleep again. But to those who understand the exact meaning of the song, it becomes quite tolerable for they sing: "God is the nourisher; buy my bread," "God is the nourisher, buy my milk," "God is the nourisher, buy my fruit." As you look out of the window, you see the Mohammedans, who are in large majority in the city, at prayer. And if they were put to vote who should be king of all the earth, fifteen thousand in that city would say Christ, but one hundred and thirty thousand would say Mohammed. Looking from the window, you see on the house-tops, and on the streets, Mohammedans at worship. The muezzin or the officers of religion, who an-toward heaven, he says: "I testify there is no deity but God, and I testify that Mohammed is the servant of God, and the messenger of God." The prayers close by the worshipper holding his hands opened upward as if to take the divine blessing, and then his hands are rubbed over his face as if to convey the blessing to his entire body.

There are two or three commendable things about Mohammedanism. One is that its disciples wash before every act of prayer, and that is five times a day, and there is a Gospel in cleanliness. Another commendable thing is, they don't care who is looking, and nothing can stop them in their prayer. Another thing is that by the order of Mohammed, and an order obeyed for thirteen hundred years, no Mohammedan touches strong drink. But the polygamy, the many-wifedness of Mohammedanism has made that religion the unutterable and everlasting curse of woman, and when woman sinks, the race sinks. The proposition recently made in high ecclesiastical places for the reformation of Mohammedanism instead of its obliteration, is like an attempt to improve a plague or educate a leprosy. There is only one thing that will ever reform Mohammedanism, and that is its extirpation from the face of the earth by the power of the Gospel of the Son of God, which makes not only man, but woman free for this life and free for the life to come.

The spirit of the horrible religion which pervades the city of Damascus along whose streets we walk and out of whose bazaars we make purchases and in whose mosques we study the wood-carvings and bedizenments, was demonstrated as late as 1860 when in this city it put to death six thousand Christians in forty-eight hours, and put to the torch three thousand Christian homes, and those streets we walk to-day were red with the carnage, and the shrieks and groans of the dying and dishonored men and women made this place a hell on earth. This went on until a Mohammedan, better than his religion, Abd-el-Kader by name, a great soldier who in one war had with twenty-five thousand troops beaten sixty thousand of the enemy, now protested against this massacre and gathered the Christians of Damascus into castles and private houses and filled his own home with the affrighted sufferers. After a while the mob came to his door and demanded the "Christian dogs" whom he was sheltering. And Abd-el-Kader mounted a horse and drew his sword and with a few of his old soldiers around him, charged on the mob and cried: "Wretches! Is this the way you honor the prophet? May his curses be upon you! Shame on you! Shame! You will yet live to repent. You think you may do as you please with the Christians, but the day of retribution will come. The Franks will yet turn your mosques into churches. Not a Christian will I give up. They are my brothers. Stand back or I will give my men the order to fire." Then by the might of one great soul under God the wave of assassination rolled nounce the time of worship appear high up on the different minarets or tall towers, and walk around the minaret, enclosed by a railing and cry in a sad and mumbling way: "God is great. I bear witness that there is no God but God. I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God. Come to prayers! Come to salvation!"

Mohammedan Caravan Approaching Damascus,

God is great. There is no other but God. Prayers are better than sleep." Five times a day must the Mohammedan engage in worship. As he begins, he turns his face toward the city of Mecca, and unrolls upon the ground a rug which he almost always carries. With his thumbs touching the lobes of his ears, and holding his face between his hands, he cries: "God is great." Then folding his hands across his girdle, he looks down and says: "Holiness to thee, O God and praise be to thee. Great is thy name. Great is thy greatness. There is no deity but thee." Then the worshipper sits upon his heels, then he touches his nose to the rug, and then his forehead, these genuflections accompanied with the cry, "Great is God." Then, raising the forefinger of his right hand back. Huzzah for Abd-el-Kader! Although now we Americans and foreigners pass through the streets of Damascus unhindered, there is in many parts of the city the subdued hissing of a hatred for Christianity that if it dared would put to death every man, woman and child in Damascus who does not declare allegiance to Mohammed. But I am glad to say that a wide, hard, splendid turnpike road has within a few years been constructed from Beyrout on the shore of the Mediterranean to this city of Damascus, and, if ever again that wholesale assassination is attempted, French troops and English troops would, with jingling bits and lightning hoofs, dash up the hills and down on this Damascus plain and leave the Mohammedan murderers dead on the floor of their mosques and seraglios. It is too late in the history of the world for governments to allow such things as the modern massacre at Damascus. For such murderous attacks on Christian missionaries and Christian disciples, the Gospel is not so appropriate as bullets or sabres sharp and heavy enough to cut through with one stroke from crown of head to saddle.

But I must say that this city of Damascus as I see it now is not as absorbing as the Damascus of olden times. I turn my back upon the bazaars, with rugs fascinating the merchants from Bagdad, and the Indian textile fabric of incomparable make, and the manufactured saddles and bridles gay enough for princes of the Orient to ride and pull, and baths where ablution becomes inspiration, and the homes of those bargain-makers of to-day, marbled, and divaned, and fountained, and upholstered, and mosaiced, and arabesqued, and colonnaded, until nothing can be added, and the splendid remains of the great mosque of John, originally built with gates so heavy that it required five men to turn them, and columns of porphyry and kneeling-places framed in diamond and seventy-four stained glass windows and six hundred lamps of pure gold, a single prayer offered in this mosque said to be worth thirty thousand prayers offered in any other place. I turn my back on all these and see Damascus as it was when this narrow street, which the Bible calls Straight, was a great wide street, a New York Broadway or a Parisian Champs Elysees, a great thoroughfare crossing the city from gate to gate, along which tramped and rolled the pomp of all nations.

There is Abraham, the father of all the faithful. He has in this city been purchasing a celebrated slave. There goes Ben Hadad of Bible times leading thirty-two conquered monarchs. There goes David, king, warrior, and sacred poet. There goes Tamerlane the conqueror. There goes Haroun al Raschid, once the commander of an army of ninety-five thousand Persians and Arabs. There comes a warrior on his way to the barracks, carrying that kind of sword which the world has forgotten how to make, a Damascus blade with the interlacings of color changing at every new turn of the light, many colors coming and going and interjoining, the blade so keen it could cut in twain an object without making the lower part of the object tremble, with an elasticity that could not be broken, though you brought the point of the sword clear back to the hilt, and having a watered appearance which made the blade seem as though just dipped in a clear fountain, a triumph of cutlery which a thousand modern foundrymen and chemists have attempted in vain to imitate. On the side of this street, damasks, named after this city, figures of animals, and fruits, and landscapes here being first wrought into silk—damasks. And specimens of damaskeening by which in this city steel and iron were first grained, and then the grooves filled with wire of gold—Damaskeening. But stand back or be run over for here are at the gates of the city laden caravans from Aleppo in one direction, and from Jerusalem in another direction, and to this house of Judas on Straight Street, and put his hands on the blind eyes of Saul that his sight might return. "Oh," said Ananias, "dare not go; that Saul is a terrible fellow. He kills Christians, and he will kill me." "Go," said the Lord, and Ananias went. There sits in blindness that tremendous persecutor. He was a great nature crushed. He had started for the city of Damascus for the one purpose of assassinating Christ's followers, but since that fall from his horse he has entirely changed. Ananias steps up to the sightless man, puts his right thumb on one eye, and the left thumb on the other eye, and in an outburst of sympathy and love, and faith says: "Brother Saul! Brother Saul! the Lord, even Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, has sent me that thou mayst receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." Instantly something like scales fell from the blind man's eyes, and he arose from that seat the mightiest evangel of all the ages, a Sir William Hamilton for metaphysical analysis, a John Milton for sublimity of thought, a Whitefield for popular eloquence, a John Howard for wide-spread philanthropy, but more than all of them put together inspired, thunderbolted, multipotent, apostolic. Did Judas, the kind host of this blind man, or Ananias, the visitor, see scales drop from the sightless eyes? I think not. But Paul knew they had fallen, and that is all that happens to any of us when we are converted. The blinding scales drop from our eyes, and we see things differently.

A Christian woman, missionary among a most degraded tribe, whose religion was never to wash or improve personal appearance, was trying to persuade one of those heathen women not only of need of change of heart, but change of habits, which would result in change of appearance, but the effort failed until the missionary had placed in her own hallway a looking-glass, and, when the barbaric woman passing through the hall, saw herself in the mirror for the first time, she exclaimed "can it be possible I look like that?" and appalled at her own appearance she renounced her old religion, and asked to be instructed in the Christian religion. And so we feel that we are all right in our sinful and unchanged condition, until the scales fall from our eyes, and in the looking-glass of God's Word we see ourselves as we really are, until Divine grace transforms us.

There are many people in this house to-day as blind as Paul was before Ananias touched his eyes. And there are many here from whose eyes the scales have already fallen. You see all subjects and all things differently—God, and Christ, and eternity, and your own immortal spirit. Sometimes the scales do not all fall at once. When I was a boy, at Mount Pleasant, one Sunday afternoon, reading Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, that afternoon some of the scales fell from my eyes and I saw a little. After I had been in the ministry about a year, one Sunday afternoon in the village parsonage reading the Bible story of the Syro-Phœnician's faith, other caravans of all nations paying toll to this supremacy. Great is Damascus!

But what most stirs my soul is neither chariot, nor caravan, nor bazaar, nor palace, but a blind man passing along the street, small of stature and insignificant in personal appearance. Oh, yes; we have seen him before. He was one of that cavalcade coming from Jerusalem to Damascus to kill Christians, and we saw him and his horse tumble up there on the road some distance out of the city, and he got up blind. Yes, it is Saul of Tarsus now going along this street called Straight. He is led by his friends, for he cannot see his hand before his face, unto the house of Judas; not Judas the bad, but Judas the good. In another part of this city one Ananias, not Ananias the liar, but Ananias the Christian, is told by the Lord to go scales fell from my eyes and I saw better. Two Sunday evenings ago, while preparing for the evening service in New York, I picked up a book that I did not remember to have seen before, and after I had read a page about reconciliation to God I think the remaining scales fell from my eyes. Shall not our visit to Damascus to-day result, like Paul's visit, in vision to the blind, and increased vision for those who saw somewhat before.

I was reading of a painter's child who became blind in infancy. But after the child was nearly grown, a surgeon removed the blindness. When told that this could be done, the child's chief thought, her mother being dead, was she would be able to see her father, who had watched over her with great tenderness. When light came she was in raptures, and ran her hands over her father's face, and shut her eyes as if to assure herself that this was really the father whom she had only known by touch, and now looking upon him, noble man as he was in appearance as well as in reality, she cried out, "Just to think that I had this father so many years and never knew him!" As great and greater is the soul's joyful surprise when the scales fall from the eyes and the long spiritual darkness is ended, and we look up into our Father's face always radiant and loving, but now for the first revealed, and our blindness forever gone, we cry "Abba Father!"

To each one of this vast multitude of auditors say as Ananias did to Saul of Tarsus when his sympathetic fingers touched the closed eyelids: "Brother Saul! Brother Saul! the Lord, even Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way that thou camest, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost!"

A Dream Solves a Problem—Good News Kept Back—Narrow Escape of Ladies in Florida—A Dog's Sagacity.

The Solution of a Mathematical Problem was discovered recently in a dream, by a school-teacher in Boston, Mass. In the course of a psychological lecture in that city the lecturer stated that an acquaintance of his, a teacher in one of the schools, undertook the solution of a problem which was difficult, but, as he believed, was capable of being solved. He studied it for a long time but could not succeed. His failure piqued him, and one day he determined that he would not go to bed that night until he had mastered it. He worked on it late into the night and eventually fell asleep in his chair the problem being still unsolved. While asleep he dreamed that he was a boy again at school, and that the problem had been given him to solve. Failing in his dream as he had in his waking hours, he dreamed that he took it to his school-teacher who worked it out, and showed him the method of its solution. When he awoke he tried the method he had seen in his dream and, to his surprise, the problem was solved. The lecturer explained the strange phenomenon on recognized psychological principles. These, however, would not be sufficient to account for the light the Christian often gains on spiritual problems that perplex him. It is when he takes them to God in prayer, that "light is given to the man whose way is hedged in." (Job 3: 24.)

A Charge of Cruelty is Being Pressed Against the warden of a penitentiary in Ohio, by the local press. It is stated that on November 27, he had in custody a prisoner condemned to death whose execution was to take place the following morning. According to custom the prisoner was taken to the death-cell, which opens on the gallows. About five o'clock in the evening the warden received notice that the man had been reprieved. He did not, however, tell him the good news until nearly midnight. During those six hours the man is said to have suffered severe mental torture fully expecting that the next morning he would have to die. He sent for a priest, and put into his hands a statement which he wished published after his death. In this paper he declared with all the solemnity of a man conscious that he was standing on the brink of eternity that he was not guilty of the murder for which he was to die and knew nothing whatever of the criminal. Shortly afterward, he was informed that the Governor had granted a reprieve: The warden is severely blamed for allowing the prisoner to suffer those six hours of misery. His defence is that he delayed giving the news in the belief that he would make a confession of his guilt. The people and the press, however, contend that the man ought not to have been kept a moment unnecessarily in ignorance of a fact so cheering. The same argument applies with still greater force to the preaching of the Gospel at home and abroad. It is emphatically good news which ought to be given without delay to every creature as our Lord commanded. (Mar. 16: 15, 16.)

A Narrow Escape From a Bottomless Pit is described in a Florida journal. It states that some young ladies from Georgia, who are passing the winter at Jasper went on November 22nd to visit a cave near that town. They were much interested in the strange place, and penetrated to its farthest extremity. It was thought to be an old lime sink, such as abound in Florida. The young girls noticed that the floor of the cave resounded to the tread, and lumps of earth would occasionally loosen themselves from the roof and walls of the cave and fall to the floor, but they thought nothing of it, and, when it began to grow dark, they left the cavern and started home. Before they had gone half a mile they heard a deep rumbling noise in the direction of the cave, but thought it was distant thunder, and paid no further attention to it. The next day, however, they heard that the floor of the cave had fallen in, leaving an awful chasm. Persons who have been to see it say that the walls are perpendicular, and that stones thrown in cannot be heard to strike bottom. Running water could be heard, however, as if a great distance below. The young ladies were prostrated with nervous shock when they heard what had occurred, and realized how narrowly they had escaped a terrible death. They had been unconscious of their danger while they stood over it, and would not have gone there if they had known it. But so much cannot be said of many who are in peril of a doom which in the Bible is compared to a bottomless pit, nor when they are warned, and the way of escape through Christ is pointed out are they moved to seek safety. (II. Chron. 36: 16.)

A Woodman's Experience While Lost in a forest in Maine, was described by a man who arrived in Bangor on November 27, from a camp on the west branch of the Penobscot. He says that a few days before he left camp, one of his men brought in a half frozen man whom he had found in the forest. It was thought he was dying, but under careful treatment he recovered and told his story. Some three weeks previous to his being found he was in Bangor, Me., drinking heavily. When his money was exhausted, he set out for the forest to get work in a logging camp. In some way he managed to get more liquor there, and became crazed under its influence. He wandered away into the deep woods and when he sobered sufficiently to realize his situation he had no idea of his distance from camp nor the way to it. His clothes had been torn to ribbons by the tree-branches during his crazy wanderings, he was bitterly cold and it was beginning to snow. Though weak and exhausted he dare not lie down, lest he should fall asleep and be frozen to death. All day and all that night he continued walking without food. The next day he found a bear trap and tried to eat the meat with which it was baited, but it was tainted and he could not touch it. A little later he found some mouldy biscuits in a deserted camp and ate them ravenously. The snow was now eight inches deep and he longed to lie down in it and sleep. He knew that to do that was to die; so he plodded on, shouting at intervals in the hope that some one might hear him. He wandered on through the second night but in the morning nature could endure the strain no longer, and he threw himself down under a tree expecting to die. There the wood-chopper found him just in time to save his life. He had travelled away from camp in his efforts to reach it, and was then twenty miles distant. His experience is a type of that of many a wanderer from God. When a man realizes his state as a sinner he dare not rest, lest his soul be eternally lost. Yet his struggles to save himself are futile. It is when he ceases to struggle and trusts in Christ that he finds rest and peace. (Hosea 13: 4.)

An Extraordinary Instance of Intelligence in a dog is reported by a citizen of Newark, N. J. He has a fox-terrier, whose instinct seems to approach reason. He has learned readily to close a door, to turn on a faucet when he wants water, and—what is still more remarkable—he has been taught to shut off the water when he has done drinking. A few days ago the dog gave another proof of his sagacity. One of the domestics missed a shawl. She looked for it in every room, but could not find it. Happening to go late at night into the recess under the basement, where the dog slept, she saw him lying upon the shawl, which was spread in his box. She concluded to let him have the use of it for that night, as it was very cold. The next morning when she wanted her shawl, she went to the box for it, but it was not there. She told her employer and he watched the dog. When night came he saw the animal go to a pile of wood in a dark corner, scratch away some light sticks, and drag the shawl out and into his box. The shawl was again missing in the morning, but it was found under the wood, where the dog had hidden it. The dog's intelligence had evidently developed to the extent of knowing that the shawl would increase his comfort, that he would not be allowed to keep it if its owner knew, and that he could only retain it by hiding it. Remarkable as the dog's sagacity and its development are, his education must be defective while he uses it only to the detriment of others. Unhappily, much of the education that children receive will have the same result. They are taught how they may get on in the world and become rich, but of morality and the eternal principles of right and wrong they hear little or nothing. That is not the kind of education God desires children to have. (Deut. 32: 46.)

A Widow's Suit Against a Wealthy Citizen of Brooklyn, N. Y., was tried in the City Court on December 4. She said that he had proposed marriage to her and she accepted him. He said, however, that for certain reasons which he gave and which seemed to her plausible it was necessary that the marriage should be secret. Believing that the man was honest and sincere she agreed and he took her to a house in a quiet street where he introduced her to a man who, he said, was a priest. He told the man that they had come to be married. The usual questions were asked and they were told to join hands. The priest then pronounced them man and wife and gave them his blessing. A year later her husband began to neglect her and finally deserted her. When she found him and insisted on his doing his duty as a husband, he told her that he was not her husband, and that the marriage was not valid, as the man who married them was not a priest, but a friend of his who had assumed the character for the occasion. The widow admitted that she had been very anxious for the marriage more on account of the man's wealth than because she loved him, that she had also suspected that the marriage was not "all right," but had silenced her fears. There is reason to fear that many are in a similar condition about their union with Christ, especially such as have made a profession from motives of worldly advancement or to please Christian friends. Some inexperienced or injudicious spiritual adviser assures them that they are converted, and though they are in doubt, may stifle the self-examination which would expose the delusion. A man cannot be born again without knowing it. (II. Cor. 13: 5.)

JESUS' PARTING WORDS.

S. S. LESSON FOR DEC. 21, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 24 : 44-53 ; GOLDEN TEXT, JOHN 14 : 3.

The Dying Charges of the Patriarchs—Christ's Parting Words a Permanent Charge to His Church—The Opening of the Disciples' Minds—Sent Out as Jesus was Sent—His Characteristics Reproduced in His Followers—The Injunction to Teach—Power Promised—Were the Early Days of the Church Her Best Days?—Christ's Last Visible Act.

IN the Old Testament, we have on record the dying charges of Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, David, Elisha, etc., when they left this world to be no more seen. But Jesus, our Lord, says of himself, "I am the Living One; and I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore." (Rev. 1 : 18, 19.) The uncertainty and the mystery which hang about death, and which veil from us how much those who sleep in Jesus are conscious of what passes on earth, could not enter into the parting of Jesus with his disciples. He lived still, "in him was life;" death had done its worst upon him, but life had conquered death. He could go away, and yet be with them "always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28 : 20); even more, he could and would dwell in their hearts by faith (Eph. 3 : 17), and be in them "the hope of glory." (Col. 1 : 27.)

Thus the parting charge of Jesus to his disciples, his incipient Church, is as fresh for his people to-day as though it were being now delivered for the first time. The first necessity was that they should Understand His Mission.

"These are my words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, how that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, concerning me." (R. V.) It was the Living Word of God endorsing the written Word; his presence as conqueror over death making the prophecies of him in all the Scriptures such a reality. No wonder that when the Spirit of God came to give them the power of testimony, the very themes they had, had such difficulty in accepting and understanding—"Jesus and the resurrection,"—became the burden of all their preaching.

"Then opened he their mind, that they might understand the Scriptures; and he said unto them, thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer (or thus it behooved Christ to suffer), and rise again from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all nations." (R. V.) It was from the yoke of sin he came to free men of all nations, that they might live unto God. An unopened mind, the mind of the natural man, cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God. (1. Cor. 2 : 14.) Let us be patient with unspiritual men, and very tender, looking to the Holy Spirit that he may "open their eyes and turn them from darkness to light," as he has done us. Three years of teaching in the very presence of Jesus did not do for the disciples what one hour of the Holy Ghost's possession did on the day of Pentecost. It was outside of them when on earth, the Holy Spirit was in them after Pentecost. (John 14 : 17.)

With his last charge, he gave them an earnest of the Spirit. He breathed on them, and said unto them, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." (John 20 : 22.) That which he had taught the two disciples on the way to Emmaus now became living truth to the "eleven and them that were with them" (V. 33); old prejudices gave way, the Christ of God stood revealed to them, outshining their carnal ideas of the Jews' Messiah

no longer to aid in setting up a temporal kingdom by earthly resources which should be helped out by supernatural power when the earthly failed—must have undergone a revolution in their hearts when he said to them, "As my Father hath sent me even so send I you." (John 20 : 21.) His prayer would come back to them, "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world." (John 17 : 18.) What then? Must the kingdom, the earthly glory, the prestige, the honor among men, the position, the influence of the Jewish nation, all of which they knew was pledged to them by the promises of God, must all this be abandoned for the present time, and only a spiritual kingdom established? Once filled with the Holy Ghost, and this apparently unreasonable anticipation became perfectly reasonable—time and eternity, the human and the divine, had become adjusted, and had taken their due proportions in their minds. "As my Father hath sent me send I you." "Are ye able to drink of the cup which I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" Are ye able to be in the world and the world know you not? Are ye able to be "despised and rejected of men," to be "hated of all nations for my name's sake," to be reviled, persecuted, your name cast out as evil for my sake, even though in your mouth shall be found no guile? Are you able to live a life of such fear and absolute dependence on me, as I have lived on my Father? I have emptied myself, and have been voluntarily unable to do anything of myself (John 5 : 19), to speak anything of myself, to judge until I have heard of him; the Father that dwelt in me, he did the works. Are ye able for such utter nothingness in yourselves, can you see the hidden glory which lies behind all this humiliation, and know that if ye suffer with me, you and I shall also be glorified together? Are ye able to deny yourselves, and all that exalts, gratifies, or glorifies you, to take up your cross and follow me? Can you "look not at the things which are seen," the present suffering and the seeming loss, "but at the things which are not seen," the wondrous glory of a life lived, not by you, but by an indwelling God, making you his temple and his habitation? Can you see the glory of your Lord using your lips to speak his words, your brain to think his thoughts, your heart to reciprocate his love, inviting you to him as he is one with the Father? What is any earthly kingdom in comparison with this? What earthly glory, position, riches, honor can compare with this reality of a life every throb of which is eternal, and which pulsates with the very being of God!

"Beginning from Jerusalem," at home, where you are known,

"Ye are His Witnesses of these things." (R. V. margin.) "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, . . . he shall bear witness of me, and ye also shall bear witness;" "the witness of two men is true." Their mission must be world-wide, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel," repentance and remission of sins, "to every creature," and do not leave them with the mere knowledge of forgiveness, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore"—the power in me is your guarantee—"and teach or make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have said unto you, and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. 28 : 18-20.) You go forth powerless, but I who have all power, go with you; even as I emptied myself, but the Father dwelt in me to do his own mighty works. But if you go thus self-empty, willing to have no name, position or honor of your own, you shall have my name, and a power of attorney to act for me. "These signs shall follow them that believe; shall they cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues, they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." (Mark 16 : 17, 18.) Men try to get rid of these words to excuse their unbelief; they try to make them belong to the apostolic times, as though God ever meant the dispensation of the Holy Ghost to be other than apostolic! They talk of fanaticism, and designate as heretics those who reverently and obediently credit their God with meaning all he says, and who have abundant and constant evidence that he has not withdrawn from his Church one of these promised signs. But this Word has stood through nearly two thousand years, and God preserves it still.

In my Name

"And behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you; but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." Perhaps it is the want of waiting upon God for power which has brought the Church of Christ into the anomalous position of taking for granted that the infant days of Christ's Church were to be the best days, and that the decline in her faith and holiness from the day of Pentecost is a necessary evil! If there were more often still waiting upon God for his all power and for his infallible leading, and more obedience to him in the life and walk of his people, the Church might have gone on from her infancy at Pentecost to a development in the likeness of Christ which might have made ready the wife of the Lamb long ere this. All power to follow Christ, and all power to witness for him is given to us in the gift of himself, but the power of the Holy Ghost to "know the things which are freely given to us of God" (1. Cor. 2 : 12), we need to wait for, to accept, and submit to very definitely. It is not a matter of emotions; the life of God in us is deeper and stiller than emotion, and possess "the hidden man of the heart." It is by an absolute surrender to, and an acceptance by faith of the Holy Spirit, that he takes possession of us, and then it is only as we yield to him day by day, and hour by hour, that he retains his hold upon us, and keeps us filled with God and emptied of our self-life.

Jesus, having delivered his charge to his disciples, "led them out as far as to Bethany." His

was to lift up his hands and bless his disciples. "As he blessed them, he was parted from them and carried up into heaven." And they, deprived of the visible presence of their Lord, but assured of, and believing in, his constant presence with them, "worshipped him and returned to Jerusalem with great joy, and were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God," happier now that they understood their Lord than in the days when they followed him on earth.

THE ADVENT PRE-MILLENNIAL.

A Paper Read at the Recent Baptist Bible Conference in Brooklyn, N. Y.

BY REV. ALFRED HARRIS.

THE first proof we offer that the coming of the Lord will be pre-millennial is the significant fact that the Word of God does not place anything between us and that blessed hope. It never says the Lord shall come after such and such an event, date, or period. But let it be remembered that the Scriptures make a broad distinction between the coming of the Lord and the day of the Lord. The coming of the Lord is represented by the Morning Star, the day of the Lord by the Sun of Righteousness. Christ as the Morning Star has to do more particularly with the Church and the first resurrection: as the Sun of Righteousness he has to do with Israel and the nations. The Morning Star precedes the day: the rising Sun of Righteousness introduces the day—the day of the Lord.

We know of many things which shall take place before the day of the Lord. The same confusion that now exists in many minds existed in the Thessalonian Church. It had been reported among them that had actually come, and they were troubled about it, because, if this was a fact, they were left behind; as the Scripture says: "One shall be taken and another left." And there was another thing that troubled them: In the cemeteries of Thessalonica the graves of their loved ones, who had died in the Lord, were undisturbed. The trumpet of the first resurrection had certainly not reached them. If the day of the ord was past and the first resurrection, and their loved ones were still entombed, they had no reason for being troubled. The Apostle Paul comes to their relief, and corrects their error in the second chapter of his second epistle. He assures them that the day of the Lord had not come and would not come until three events had occurred; I. The coming of the Lord, or the descent of the Lord into the air, and our gathering together unto him. II. The great apostasy, "A falling away." III. The appearance of Antichrist. "For that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition," etc.

These things were to precede the day of the Lord, but neither there nor in any other part of Scripture are we told of anything intervening before the coming of the Lord; so that if we have his appearing, we may look for it to occur any time even at the present hour.

The First Resurrection.

One of many convincing proofs that the coming of Christ will be before the Millennium is found in the accounts we have of the first resurrection. The characteristics of that first resurrection are: I. It will be a resurrection of the just. "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." (Luke 14: 14.) II. It will be elective. "But they that shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead." (Luke 20: 25.) III. A proof or manifestation of sonship. "They are the children of God being the children of the resurrection." (Luke 20: 36.) Now when will it take place? At the second coming of Christ. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." (1 Cor. 15: 23.) Will that be before, or after the Millennium? The answer is unmistakable: "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy are they that have part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be the priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." (Rev. 20: 5, 6.) Thus the second or general resurrection comes after the thousand years, or the Millennium, and is a thousand years after the first resurrection which takes place at the beginning of the Millennium; as that resurrection is simultaneous with the coming of Christ, it follows that Christ will come before the Millennium.

The testimony of the Scriptures concerning the Kingdom also proves that the coming of the Lord will be pre-millennial. Christ will set up his kingdom in person. (Daniel 7: 13, 27; Luke 19: 11, 15.) But when will he do this? At the end of the times of the Gentiles. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The times of the Gentiles are the times of Gentile dominion and supremacy. They include that portion of history covered by the four universal kingdoms referred to in Daniel 2: 31, 45. What is to succeed the times of the Gentiles? The Kingdom of God—the kingdom of the Son of Man. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; but it shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." (Daniel 2: 44.) Christ is to sway the sceptre of unlimited empire over the nations for a thousand years of blessedness. Under his reign all things will be brought into subjection to God. His will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven. All the enemies of God shall be subdued. Death will be destroyed. And at the time when, as Post-millennarians say, Christ will come, he will have been here for a thousand years, subduing evil, and making all things according to God. He will then deliver up the restored kingdom in glory and blessedness to his Father. In all the earth there will be no unsubdued evil, no rebellious sinner, no enemy of God or man. And then God will be all and in all.

It may be asked, Must not the world be converted before Christ comes? The New Testament does not teach this, but the very reverse. "When the Son of Man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" (Luke 18: 8.) In the last days there will be perilous times. (1 Timothy 4: 1-3; II. Timothy 3: 1-5.) "As it was in the days of Noah so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man." (Matt. 24: 37). Christ will come when the world will be in such a condition as it is now. It will be full of scoffers and unbelievers, asking "Where is the promise of his coming?" Iniquity will abound and the love of many will wax cold. There will be wars and rumors of wars at the very time that Christ will come.

Then some may ask, "How could Christ say three times in the last chapter of the Bible, Behold I come quickly, when he knew that he would not come at least for 1,800 years?" Our life is confined within the narrow limits of three score years and ten; but Christ works on a vast and eternal scale. "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." On the dial-plate of the eternal future eighteen hundred years are but a passing shadow, a mere moment of time. From this divine standard Christ says, "Surely I come quickly." And let all the redeemed of the Lord say, "Come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

[This paper with the others delivered at the Conference will shortly be published in book form with a full and authorized report of the proceedings.]

THE WAITING FAMILY.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Dec. 21. "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself." John 14: 3.

A DREARY winter day with leaden sky and wind rushing and sighing, and moaning like a creature in pain and fear. A day when women stayed within doors and kept good fires going, and made things cheerful to welcome their beloved men-folk when they should come home after the toils of the day.

Two men who had been breasting the storm on the hill-side were stepping briskly toward the valley, where, nestling among trees, was an old-fashioned house covered, with climbing ivy. As they approached the gate, one of them said: "Now, I must say good-bye, Edward. You must give the last evening to your own people. They will want you all to themselves."

"That is very considerate of you, Paul," replied the other. "You are always thinking more of other people than of yourself. It would make my going away much more painful if I were not leaving you behind to comfort my mother and the girls. When the vision of their faces visits me in the far-away land I shall see your face among them. They will need all you can do to cheer them."

"It shall be done. Good-bye, and may God bless and prosper you."

The two men held each other's hands in a warm, lingering clasp and then parted, the one going his way farther down the valley, the other passing through the garden and into the house. It was a sad family circle that was gathered under its roof. Death had taken away its head some months before, and now Edward, the oldest son, was leaving it. The family was in straitened circumstances. Some addition to its income was necessary and Edward was going to England to represent an American business firm in that country and build up a connection there. It was the only thing that offered and though it entailed separation from all he loved, he had accepted it because of its promise of assured permanence and future prosperity. He was to sail the next day, and that evening was consequently a trying one for all.

"Mother," he said, after the avoidance of the subject of his departure, and the effort at forced cheerfulness had become too painful to be borne, "I hope you will not be too much cast down. Look forward to the time when we shall all be together again. It will not be long. I am sure to succeed and then we will have a home across the water as beautiful as this and you will be queen of it. I shall write you sooner than you think to come out; or perhaps I may come and fetch you."

The mother tried to smile, but the effort cost too much, and she broke down in a fit of hysterical sobbing. She hurried out of the room and away to her own chamber, lest her daughters should break down, too.

"Annie," said her brother, "I am leaving my Sunday School boys in your care. You know what I have been trying to do for them. They are wild lads, gathered out of the streets, with all their home life against them. I hoped I should have been able to see them grow up with good principles, loving Christ and strong in him against temptation; but it is not to be. You will be patient with them and tell them I am thinking of them and praying for them."

"I will do my best, Edward, God helping me."

"I am sure you will and do not lose any time. You will be taken from them soon, if I succeed as I hope to do. Use your opportunity while you have it. And the poor people down in the village, Helen you will look after them. They will not expect money from you. I have never given them much. It is sympathy and comfort that they need most. Get them to look to God and they will be happy even in their poverty. If money is badly needed, write me and I will send you some; but they are not likely to need it; they are learning to help themselves."

Helen promised, as her sister had done, and their mother having rejoined the circle, they all knelt in prayer for God's blessing on the one who was leaving and those who remained.

The early days of Edward's absence were days of sorrow, for he had been the life of the family and his loss was sorely felt. But the girls became interested in their work, and their mother lived in the hope of reunion with her son, and they grew cheerful and happy, though he was never out of their thoughts. His letters told of his excellent progress, and were full of hope. After a time he expressed the wish that one of his sisters should come to him, as he had set up a little cottage and pined for a home face in it. Mary, the youngest, went, at his suggestion, because she could finish her education there better than here, and could be more easily spared than either of the others. It was a little circle now, but Mary's going showed that Edward must be getting on, and reunion seemed nearer.

"How like this is to the day before Edward went away," his mother said, one November day, three years after that terrible separation; "it is just as gloomy, but we do not feel so bad now as we did then."

They gathered around the table for the evening meal and talked of Edward's last letter, and Mary's account of the country, to which, after a year's residence, she was growing accustomed. Edward's friend, Paul, dropped in, as he frequently did at that hour, and joined them at the meal. He brought the good news that he had arranged to go with them whenever they should go. It was the best kind of news, for he had Helen's promise to be his wife, and his going would save her from the dilemma she would be in, with her brother in one country, and her lover in another.

They were talking gleefully of the future when a sharp ring at the bell startled them. Annie went to the door, and a moment later they heard a cry of joy, and then Edward and Mary with him, burst into the room. Never was there such a scene of joy as in that little home that night.

"No more poverty, mother, no more hard work, girls," Edward said. "I have a lovely home in the country, and Mary has made it as beautiful inside, as it is outside. There is a sitting-room for mother and a music-room for you girls; we have thought of all your tastes. There is a garden and a shrubbery, and all that is nice. We have come to fetch you to your new home, and we shall be all together once more."

"Thank God," said the mother reverently. "I knew you would keep your promise."

DEFERRED HARVESTS.

ALL Christian workers are sometimes conscious of being discomfited. There is your Sunday School class that have not yet been brought to Christ. You say: "How strange it is that, after all my teachings, they have not submitted to the truth." You say: "There is my family, nearly all of them out of the kingdom of God's grace. How I have prayed for them; how I have counselled them; how I have tried to bring upon them all Christian influences; and yet they will not hear the voice of heavenly mercy." You can look out in the world and see scores of times in which you were working for Christ and in the right spirit; but you saw absolutely no result. And so you sometimes sit down in discouragement. You say: "It must be that I haven't the right kind of sickle; that I haven't gone into the right kind of harvest-field; that I don't know how to plow, and that I am entirely incompetent for the sphere to which the Lord has called me." Ah! Christian, in this sadness of heart you are only repeating the history of all who have gone before you; but remember this thought, that every effort put forth for Christ's sake will be successful, whether you witness the result or not. The seed of Gospel truth planted, will come up in a glorious harvest, may be twenty or forty years after you are dead. But the Lord gathers up all the tears of his dear children in a bottle, and he keeps them, and he remembers them; and no sigh over the obduracy of those who are around about you, and no prayer offered up for the redemption of the people, and no Christian counsel given on the street-corner, and no word of exhortation lifted in a prayer-meeting, but shall somewhere, somehow, at some time be gloriously successful.

A plain promise this—not a mere notion of ours: "He that goeth forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." Father met a black man along the road. The black man stopped him and said: "I wish to speak to you, Mr. Talmage. I suppose you don't know me?" "No," was the reply, "I don't remember you." "Well," says the man, "I haven't seen you for forty years; but, in the old school-house at Gatesville, I heard you say, about forty years ago, in one of your prayers, 'Thou God seest us,' and that thought I carried with me year after year. I couldn't escape from it. That sentence which I heard uttered by your lips, forty years ago, made me a Christian." And it may be that the word of Christian encouragement that you spoke to-day, that the simple question that you asked some comrade along the street, will tell on eternal ages. Be not, therefore, discouraged. The day of reckoning will come, and all the greater will be the surprise if, having known nothing of our success in this world, when standing before the throne of God, we shall hear a great acclaim from a multitude who shall point to us as the instrumentality of their eternal salvation!

It is very different working in an enterprise where you expect to be defeated, from working in an enterprise where you know you are going to succeed. If we know we shall finally triumph, although there may be many disappointments and reverses, we keep our courage up all the way. Therefore, let us remember that we are going to be in the majority; that Christ is going to reclaim this world for himself; that all sin and darkness and suffering shall be done away; and that great procession will be formed in which will move the sons and daughters of light. The trumpet is only just beginning to marshal the Lord's hosts. The batteries are only just being planted. The war has scarcely opened. There has here and there been a little skirmish; but, after a while, God will mass the troops and bring on a general engagement, and then the victory will be decisive and universal.

SPIRITUAL ANÆSTHETICS.

SOME years ago, wandering through the streets of Edinburgh, Scotland, we were surprised to find photographs of the same face in almost all the public windows—the windows of stores and shops and hotels. They were photographs of the face of James Y. Simpson, the skillful physician, who had just died. Why was it that he was so beloved in Edinburgh, and honored through all Britain, and admired amid the most intelligent classes of the earth? It was because he had discovered the qualities and the adaptiveness of chloroform, and had found out the fact that men under that influence might be subjected to the severest surgical operation without suffering pain. All the hospitals and the sick-rooms of the earth might well thank God for that revelation. But long before Dr. Simpson revealed that medication as applied to physical disease, there had been found in the earth a spiritual chloroform that would put the Church of God into a sound stupor, under which it could have this grace taken away, and that attainment amputated, until it should be left a mere fragment of what God intended. The most important work now to be done is the rousing up of the Church of God from its state of somnolence and stupidity.

It must be a simple fact that multitudes of professors of religion in the churches to-day know nothing of practical religion. Among the original twelve who were around Christ there was one who came into condemnation and had no right to sit at the banquet—indicating that one-twelfth of those who profess the faith of Christ do not really possess it. Ay, we must go further with the statement, and say that if, in the times of trial, when the original disciples and apostles lived, and there was so much to test their faith; if, in the day of fire and sword, when it was such a hard thing to profess the faith of the Gospel—even then there was one-twelfth cast away, may we not solemnly suppose before God and the Church that in this day, when there are no fires to test our earnestness, and it is comparatively easy to glide into the outside kingdom of God, there may be one-eighth or one-sixth professing the faith of Christ who do not exercise it. The subject is overwhelming, and leads each one of us to cry out, "Lord, is it I?"

There are reasons why it does seem that some who profess the faith of Christ do not really possess its power. If we understand the Bible aright it implies—yea, positively states—that the grace of God in the soul is a light, and we are told to let our light shine, and there is no indication that religion can ever be a dark lantern. If religion urges a man to active effort for the salvation of others, and a man having come into the Church of Christ shows no anxiety in regard the redemption of the people, there is not an awful suspicion against him?

BRIEF NOTES.

Last Sunday evening Dr. Talmage announced before beginning his sermon that the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had secured an extension of the lease of the Academy of Music in New York, for the Sunday evening services, as from present indications the New Tabernacle will not be ready for occupation before Easter. These services continue to be thronged with a crowd of people larger than the Academy will hold. Dr. Talmage has been in the habit of addressing those who cannot get in, from the Academy steps, after the usual exercises. As the weather has now become too inclement for him to do so, the publisher of this journal is trying to obtain the use of some public building in the neighborhood in which an overflow service may be held.

Evangelist Billings has closed a successful series of meetings at Ainsworth, Neb., and has begun work at Cowles.

Mr. Moody is spending several weeks in Chicago, preaching daily to crowded houses at his old-time "Moody Church" on Chicago Avenue.

The Russian epidemic, La Grippe, is again appearing in London. During the past fortnight four deaths have been directly attributed to that disease.

Mr. P. T. Barnum, of Bridgeport, Conn., on Thanksgiving Day deceded to the Universalist Church of the Redeemer, of which he is a member, a house and lot worth $10,000.

Students from twenty-five New England colleges are to meet at Amherst during the approaching vacation for systematic Bible study. F. K. Sanders, of Yale, will conduct the classes.

Mr. Spurgeon has left London for Mentone. He had a smooth passage, and spent two days in Paris. When leaving London, he had not quite recovered from his recent attack of rheumatic gout, but is now decidedly better.

At the regular meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society on Dec. 4, it was stated that during the month of November grants of books had been made of the value of $7,602. The issues from the Bible House during the same month had been 97,388 volumes making a total since April 1, of 676,956.

Rev. Geo. C. Needham, the Evangelist, has been called by earnest entreaty to accept the pastorate pro tem. of Dr. Lorimer's church of Chicago, for at least four months, when it is hoped Dr. Lorimer will be ready to occupy his pulpit. Mr. Needham will do Evangelistic and missionary work in connection with pastoral work in Chicago.

The Children's Aid Society of New York, reports an expenditure during the year of $362,007. This includes among other items the expense of twenty-one Industrial schools, twelve night-schools, the support of lodging-houses in which 12,252 boys and girls were fed and sheltered, and the outfit and railroad fares to homes in the West of 2,851 children.

Rev. R. G. Pearson has concluded his Evangelistic services at Natchez, Miss. The Daily Democrat of that city says: "Natchez has never undergone such a stirring evangelical movement as has been witnessed since Mr. Pearson's arrival, increasing in interest from day to day, until the hours of service were looked for with eagerness by all classes."

The American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions announce that the advance in the price of silver owing to recent Congressional legislation will increase the expense of carrying on the missions in India, China, and Japan, by from $40,000 to $50,000 a year. For the coming year they will need $548,000 to maintain the missions in the present state of efficiency without allowing anything for growth and development.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President's Message—Parnell's Great Fight to Retain his Leadership—Holland's Girl-Queen—The Copyright Bill Passes the House—Missionary Perils at Ponapi—Outrages in Armenia, etc.

President Harrison's Message to Congress was sent in to that body on the 1st inst. He announces that the country is at ease with all nations; congratulates it on its delegates being foremost in advocating measures for the repression of African slavery; reviews affairs in Central America and states that U. S. Minister Mizner exceeded his duty in permitting the surrender of General Barrundia, in the steamer Acapulco, while in the port of San Jose de Guatemala, and was therefore recalled. The message says that our relations with China have been a matter of much consideration and that a conventional regulation of the passage of Chinese laborers across our frontier has been proposed; it announces the ratification of the Samoan Treaty and its satisfactory workings; also the treaty of extradition with Great Britain. It intimates that the whole correspondence in the Behring Sea dispute will be shortly laid before Congress. The President declares that if the passage of the new Tariff Law has operated to the detriment of Hawaii, such a result was unintentional. He tells Congress that it will be asked to consider an extradition treaty with Italy. Turning to the finances of the country, he states that the surplus has been reduced to $105,000,000, the revenues for 1890 have been $403,000,000, and the expenditures $15,000,000 more than in 1889. Our new navy, he declares, has made very satisfactory progress during the year. We should pay the Sioux Indians for the fourteen million acres of land ceded by them to the Government, as promptly as possible. Concerning the Tariff, he believes that the new law is entitled to a fair trial by the country, when it will be shown that it conserves the interest of trade and the workingman, besides enlarging our home market. He renews his recommendation for the establishment of an International Bank, and also for the passage of a Bankruptcy Law. He takes strong grounds in favor of an effective Election Law, fair to all sections, alike and says that legislation in this direction will not revive race animosities, as has been claimed. The Message was accompanied by the official reports of the various departments.

Parnell's Great Fight to Retain the Leadership of his party has become an international topic. Stirred to action by the clamor for his retirement, he issued a manifest appealing to the Irish people to sustain him, and criticising the policy of Home Rule proposed by Mr. Gladstone. He strongly resented the assumption of the Liberals in the British Parliament to dictate to the Irish members. The manifesto charged both Gladstone and Morley with bad faith, and was at once the means of drawing out letters from these gentlemen, repudiating Parnell's statements. The situation was further complicated by the action of the Irish envoys now in the United States, who, together with many other leading members of the Irish Parliamentary party in London, took action looking to the desertion of Parnell, or at least advising his retirement for the sake of their common cause. A stormy meeting of the Irish members of the House of Commons was held, Parnell being present. Although it was clear that the sentiment was against his continuance as leader, with the aid of his friends, he contrived to delay action. Parnell told them he had sent Justin McCarthy to Mr. Gladstone with an offer to retire, if Gladstone would give his written promise to support a true Home Rule Bill, when the Liberals returned to power, but this the ex-Premier refused to do, and would not recognize Parnell in the matter. The Parnellites next endeavored to effect a compromise by proposing again to approach Gladstone with an offer of Parnell's retirement, conditional on certain Home Rule pledges being given by Gladstone.

As the fight now stands, his opponents who are in his own party seem determined on his removal, and the selection of a new leader. Meanwhile, the Irish Envoys in this country have abandoned their tour and will return home, O'Brien and Dillon in all probability to cells in Clonmel jail, to serve out the terms to which they have been sentenced in their absence.

Over Two Thousand Doctors From All Parts of the world have arrived at Berlin, for the purpose of studying Professor Koch's method in consumptive cases. So great is the demand for information that the Berlin authorities have been compelled to notify new arrivals that it is impossible to accommodate them at the hospitals where they desire to study. Thus far, as Koch himself admits, there has been no positive cure following the application of the lymph. Dr. Levy, his first assistant, and Dr. Koeller, chief of the Berlin Charity Hospital, agree in the statement that the chief value thus far demonstrated has been its efficacy in diagnosing the presence of tuberculosis. Attacks have been made both in Germany, Austria and England on Professor Koch with the view of belittling his method, but the popular excitement over the discovery continues. Several packages of the precious lymph have already been received by American physicians who are now experimenting.

There are Now Two Baby Monarchs in Europe,

the King of Spain and the Queen of Holland. The former is now about six years old, while the latter (whose portrait is given in this column) is an interesting little girl of ten. On the death of her father, King William III., (chronicled last week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), the girl-Queen succeeded to the throne of the Netherlands, but until she is of age she will remain under the care of her mother, Queen Emma, as Queen Regent. The little Queen is a child of fair complexion and is said to be very amiable and sweet-tempered—a good augury for her subjects when she shall have begun to reign in earnest. She will be one of the richest women in the world, being heiress to $4,000,000 left by her late brother, the Prince of Orange, and also to the possessions of her father, King William.

The Passage of the International Copyright bill by the House of Representatives last week, by a vote of one hundred and thirty-nine to ninety-five, is calculated to give the liveliest satisfaction to a very large class of publishers. It is what is known as the Simonds Bill, which was defeated by a very light adverse vote in the House last spring. It is now thought the measure will be favorably viewed by the Senate, when it comes up before that body.

A Man Who has Risen from Obscurity to a lofty position among his fellows is Samuel Gompers, the President of the American Federation of Labor whose portrait we give below. In something less than ten years, he has built up by his splendid qualities of organization, a body of workmen which now aggregates little less than 600,000 members, representing every trade and calling in the Union. Purely a labor organization, the Federation has stood aloof from politics and has made its way by strictly refraining from meddling with slates and candidates. Its annual convention shortly to be held at Detroit, will be very largely attended. One of the commendable features of the organization is its policy of opposing strikes, save as a last resort. Mr. Gompers is a native of England and a practical tradesman. He began to be known as a leading spirit in labor councils when fifteen years of age, and his progress has been constantly upward. He is about forty-five years of age, and is now serving his second term as President of the Federation. Like many other men who had few youthful advantages, he was taken from school at an early age and strove, by studying evenings, to acquire the rudiments of education. He strove to some purpose, for he has proved to be a capable writer, a strong debater and a sound orator.

Atrocities Almost Beyond Belief by Reason of their barbarity, are reported by cable from Armenia. Scarcely a day passes in which the Kurdish troops instigated by Turkish authority, do not let loose their fiendish passions on the helpless Armenians. Three of the latter were burned on grain-stacks at the town of Boulanuk; six were shot and robbed at Van, an Armenian, named Aletdjian was horribly tortured with red-hot irons and his tongue pierced with a dagger by these half-savage soldiers, who are encouraged in their man-hunting by the officials at Constantinople. Thus far, remonstrances from other governments have passed unheeded, but it seems incomprehensible that such offences against civilization can much longer be permitted by the European Powers.

Jesuitical Machinations in Ponapi, one of the small group of islands known as the Carolines, have stirred up the natives to hostility, and placed the lives of several American missionaries in peril. When the U. S. steamer Alliance called there lately, its commander found that a war had broken out between the natives and the Spaniards. The latter had craftily accused the American missionaries of fomenting the trouble, and as the missionaries were totally unprotected, the commander of the Alliance took them on board, and removed them to Oulan, another island of the same group. These islands are claimed by Spain, and the priests and Jesuits were embittered against the missionaries who had been received with open arms by the native population, being instigated in this opposition by the Spanish Government. The natives resented Jesuitical interference, and some three years ago, killed several Spanish officials, although the missionaries tried to prevent the attack. Mr. Doane one of the American missionaries, was arrested and placed on trial at Manila. The United States Government interfered and he was released, and returned to Ponapi, where he was welcomed by the natives. It now seems, from the latest dispatches, that the old strife has been revived by the Spaniards. The island has been the headquarters of the American missionaries for several years. At the time of the latest outbreak, there were besides Mr. Doane, Mr. Rand, Miss Fletcher, and Miss Palmer, engaged in missionary work.

THE BAFFLED ENEMY.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Job's Poverty and Bereavements—Blameless in Suffering—Sinless in Mourning—The Lessons of His Trial—I. The Main Thing in all Affairs—Not to Sin—Censure of Little Importance—Suffering Develops and Ripens—Satan Defeated—II. Fear of Sinning in Trial—Danger of Losing Patience—Of being Rebellious—Of Despair—III. Mourning Without Sin—IV. The Sin of Charging God Foolishly—V. The Honor of Victory.

"In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly."
—Job 1 : 22.

THAT is to say, in all this trial, and under all this temptation, Job kept right with God. During all the losses of his estate, and the deaths of his children, he did not speak in an unworthy manner. The text speaks admirably of "all this;" and a great "all" it was. Some of you are in troubles many; but what are they compared with those of Job? Your afflictions are mole-hills contrasted with the Alps of the patriarch's grief. "All this"! He was suddenly reduced from a man of great wealth to a person in absolute poverty; from a happy father to a childless mourner. Who can measure or fathom "all this?" Yet, "In all this Job sinned not." Here was the triumph of a gracious spirit. Ah, dear friends! if God could uphold Job in all this, you may be sure that he can support you. Look to him for this divine support.

"All this" also alludes to all that Job did, and thought, and said. He was full of bursting with swelling grief, he shaved his head, and rent his garments, and he lifted up his voice unto the Lord his God; but "In all this Job sinned not." He rose up, for he was a man of action, a man of a sensitive and powerful mind, a man of poetic energy, who could not fail to express his emotions in striking symbols; but "In all this Job sinned not." This is a great deal to say of a man when you see him in the extreme of trial. If in patience he can possess his soul when all the arrows of affliction are wounding him, he is a man indeed.

I. Our first head shall be, in all our affairs The Main Thing is, not to sin. It is not said, "In all this Job was never spoken against," for he was spoken against by Satan in the presence of himself; and very soon he was falsely accused by men who should have comforted him. You must not expect, dear friend, that you will pass through this world, and have it said of you in the end, "In all this no one ever spoke against him." I heard say of one man, "He was a man who never had an enemy." I ventured to add, "nor a friend." He has no friend who never had a foe. Those who secure zealous lovers are pretty sure to call forth intense adversaries. A man who is such a chip in the porridge that he never offends, is pretty sure to be equally flavorless in the other direction. The trimmer may dodge through the world without much censure; but it will seldom be so with an out-and-out man of God. Because he is not of the world, the world will hate him. To go through life without calumny is not a thing to be expected; but it is anxiously to be desired that we may go through every phase of joy or of sorrow without falling into sin.

Neither is it a chief point for us to seek to go through life without suffering, since the Lord's servants, the best of them, are ripened and mellowed by suffering. Amos, the herdsman, was a bruiser of sycamore figs—a kind of fig that never ripened in Palestine unless it was struck with a rod, and thus was bruised. I fear me, there are very few of the godly who will fully ripen without affliction. The vine bears but little fruit unless it makes the acquaintance of the knife, and is sternly pruned. I fear that much fruit will seldom be forthcoming without much tribulation. A high character might be produced, I suppose, by continued prosperity; but it has very seldom been the case. Adversity, however it may appear to be our foe, is our true friend; and, after a little acquaintance with it, we receive it as a precious thing, the prophecy of a coming joy. It should be no ambition of ours to traverse a path without thorn or stone.

Remember, if the grace of God prevents our affliction from driving us into sin, then Satan is defeated. Satan did not care what Job suffered, so long as he could hope to make him sin; and he was foiled when he did not sin. He must have regretted that he tried him, when he found that he could not make him sin. I think I hear the friend muttering, "Give him back his camels; give him back his sheep; if by the loss of these his patience and resignation are made manifest." If he could not extract a rebellious speech from Job, the tempter had lost all his cruel efforts: his malice had spent itself without result. If he could not make the good man sin, nor charge God foolishly, and God was glorified. If in enduring your particular trouble, my dear friend, you do not fall into sin, you are more than a conqueror over him that hateth you. The arch-enemy will fly away confounded from you, if you are able to resist him while darkness covers your soul. If you conquer him in your hour of grief, you conquer indeed.

He Was Defeated,

If you do not sin while under the stress of heavy trouble, God will be honored. He is not so much glorified by preserving you from trouble, as by upholding you in trouble. He allows you to be tried that his grace in you may be tested and glorified. When one Winstanley, years ago, built a lighthouse on the Eddystone Rock, he said that he was sure that it would stand any storm that ever blew, and he should himself like to be in it in the fiercest tempest that ever drove adown the Channel. It came to pass that he was in his own erection one night, and there came a tremendous blast, which swept him and his lighthouse clean away, so that he was never heard of more. He courted trial because he Believed in His Work.

God permits trial because he knows that his grace has made us able to bear it. The lighthouse which was afterwards built on the Eddystone has had all manner of storms beating upon it, but it has outlived them all; and therefore its builder's name is held in honor. Even thus our God is glorified in every trial of his saints, when their grace enables them to endure with patience.

Remember, furthermore, that if you do not sin, you yourself will be no loser by all your tribulations. Sin alone can injure you; but if you remain steadfast, though you are stripped, you will be clothed with glory; though you are deprived of comfort, you will lose no real blessing. True, it may not seem a pleasant thing to be stripped, and yet if one is soon going to bed, it is no great consequence. It is no easy thing to part with wealth; but if thereby you are unburdened, the loss is a gain. A child of God may have the knife sharply cutting him, but if it only removes the superfluous wood, it may be of the utmost benefit to the fruitage of the tree; and that is the main thing. If the metal in the pot loses none of its gold, all that it does lose is well lost, and is, indeed, really gained. Though you be reduced in circumstances, what matters it, if you are enlarged in spirit? Though you be sick in body, what matters it, if the soul's health be furthered thereby? To sin would be terrible; in holiness is triumph. In all our affliction may there be no defection.

Danger of Sin in Trial.

II. And, now, a second thought arises out of the text. In all time of trial there is special fear of our sinning. It is well for the child of God to remember that the hour of darkness is an hour of danger. Suffering is fruitful soil for certain forms of sin. Dear friends, if you are approaching a season of trouble, watch and pray that, in entering upon trial, you may not also enter upon sinning. Many have sorely grieved their God by what they have said and done in the hour of sorrow.

For instance, we are apt to grow impatient. We murmur against the Lord. We think our trial is too long, or that prayer is not answered when it ought to be. If God be faithful, why does he not hasten to deliver his child? In the olden time he rode upon a cherub and did fly yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind; but why are his chariots now so long in coming? The feet of his mercy seem shod with lead. Petulance and complaining are sins which easily beset those who are severely tried. Men are apt to have bitter thoughts of God when he puts his hand into the bitter box, and brings out the quinine of sorrow.

Leads to Rebellion.

We are even tempted to rebellion against God. I have met with cases in which rebellious words have been uttered, and even spoken again and again. One said in my hearing. "God has taken away my mother, and I shall never forgive him. I can never think of him as a God of love as once I did." Such words will cause a child of God more pain than the loss itself occasioned. I heard one say of his dying child, whom I was called to visit, that he could not believe that God would be so unjust as to take his daughter from him. Indeed, he spoke so rebelliously that I, with all gentleness, but with deep solemnity of soul, admonished him that I feared the Lord would visit him for such proud speeches. It was clear that his child would soon die, and I feared that he would die himself, when the shock came, because he so stoutly quarrelled with the Lord. I said to myself, "A child of God cannot speak in this way about his Father without coming under further chastisement." It came to pass as I expected, and he himself was laid low. Grieved as I was, I was by no means surprised. How can we rebel against God, and hope to prosper in that rebellion? Oh, for grace not only to yield because we must, but because we trust!

May Cause Despair.

We may also sin by despair. An afflicted one said, "I shall never look up again. I shall go mourning all my days." Dear friend, why not be cheerful again? In the dark is the place for trust, not for despair. A child that is sullen will probably make for himself ten times more misery than the rod of itself would cause him. Who dares despair while God bids him trust? Come, if you are as poor as Job, be as patient as Job, and you will find hope ever shining like a star which never sets.

Men have been driven into a kind of atheism by successive troubles. They have wickedly argued—"There cannot be a God, or he would not let me suffer so." Beloved, you must not speak as the foolish do; and such speech is sheer folly. Your mouth would be greatly defiled if you were to vex the Holy Spirit. Has the Lord saved you, and will you speak against him? I have no time to say more where so much might be added. The Lord preserve us in trying times from sinning, either with heart or lip.

III. Notice, thirdly, that

In Mourning We Need Not Sin.

Hearken: you are allowed to weep. You are allowed to show that you suffer by your losses. See what Job did. "Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped:" and "in all this Job sinned not." The mother wept much over her child, and yet she may not have sinned: a mother's grief and a mother's love are sacred things. When a dear child is mourned over, those may have been not only perfectly natural tears, but even holy tears. The husband lamented sorely when his beloved was taken from him. He was right. I should have thought far less of him if he had not done so. "Jesus wept."

But there is a measure in the expression of grief. Job was not wrong in rending his garment: he might have been wrong if he had torn it into shreds. You may wear mourning: saints did so in other times. You may weep; for it may perhaps be a relaxing of your strained emotions. Do not restrain the boiling floods. A flood of tears without may assuage the deluge of grief within. Job's acts of mourning were moderate and seemly—toned down by his faith. I wish that Christians did not so often follow the of the world at their funerals, but would try to make it clear that they sorrow not even as others that are without hope. You may wear sack so long that it becomes the ensign of rebellion against the will of the Lord.

Job mourned, and yet did not sin; for he mourned, and worshipped as he mourned. This is what I commend to you who are mourning at this time. If you must fall on the ground, worship there before the Lord. If your heart bowed down, emulate the holy ones who fall on their faces and worship God. I believe that none of the truest, purest, sweetest, and longest devotion has come to God from hearts that were breaking with grief. Remember, then, that in acts of mourning there is not, of necessity, any sin.

IV. But fourthly, in

Charging God Foolishly

We sin greatly. "Job sinned not," and the phrase which explains it is, "nor charged God foolishly." Here let me say that to call God to our judgment-seat at all is a high crime and misdemeanor. "Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" Woe unto him that contendeth with his Maker. The Lord is absolutely sovereign, and he giveth no account of his matters. We are usurping fools when we pretend to sit in judgment upon the Judge of all the earth.

In the next place, we sin in requiring that we should understand God. Are you not content to believe him? The demand for explanation is unbelief. This is, indeed, making yourselves to be wiser than God. Let us bow before him without a question. He is Jehovah, and that ends the matter. He would have his children feel that what he wills is always best. Bow before God, and prostrate your desire and thought and judgment before his throne. What he does is wise and true and kind; and of this we are sure. We can very easily charge God foolishly, but we had better not charge him at all; for who are we that we should call the Eternal to account?

Some, however, will bring foolish charges against his love. "How can he be a God of love if he permits me to suffer so?" You forget that word—"As many as I tenderly love" (for that is the Greek word), "I rebuke and chasten." The more the Lord loves you, the more surely he will rebuke any and every evil that he sees in you. You are so precious to him, that he desires to make you perfect in every good work to do his will. God prizes you much, my sister, or you would not have to be so often ground upon the wheel.

To Take Away all Excrescences

and make the jewel of your soul to shine. "Oh," said a worldling to me when I was in great pain and weakness of body, "is this the way God treats his children? Then I am glad I am not one." How my heart burned within me, and my eyes flashed, as I said that I would take an eternity of such pain as I endured sooner than stand in the place of the man who preferred ease to God. Beloved, we are willing to take the divine love with every possible drawback that can be conceived: for the love of our Father is a weight of glory, and all the sorrows of time are but "light afflictions," and they last but for a moment.

Alas! At times, unbelief charges God foolishly with reference to his power. We think that he cannot help us in some peculiar trial. Throw to the winds such fears; they are unworthy of us, and dishonoring to our Lord. Is anything too hard for the Lord? Through flood and fire he will bring us in safety.

V. Lastly—as I must close in haste—to come through great trial without sin is the honor of the saints. If we are tried, and come forth from it naked as when we were born, we need not be ashamed; but if we come out of it without sinning, then the greatness of the affliction increases

The Honor of Our Victory.

"In all this Job sinned not:" the "all this" is a part of the glory with which grace covered him. Suppose that your life was all ease: suppose that you were brought up tenderly from a child, well educated, left with a sufficient fortune to gratify every wish, happily married, free from sickness, lifted above care, grinding labor, and heavy sorrow: what then? Assuredly you could never be noted for patience. Who would ever have heard of Job, if he had not been tried? None would have said of him, "In all this Job sinned not." Only by his patience could he be perfected and immortalized. Suppose that your record should be: from birth a sufferer, throughout life a struggler; at home a wrestler, and abroad a soldier and a cross-bearer; and, notwithstanding all this, full of joy and peace, through strong believing: tried to the uttermost, yet found faithful. In such a chronicle there is something worth remembering. Discomforts and danger make men of us, and then we deal no more with childish things, but

With Eternal Matters.

The honor of a Christian, or let me say, the honor of God's grace in a Christian, is when we have so acted that we have obeyed in detail, not forgetting any point of duty. "In all this Job sinned not," neither in what he thought, or said, or did; nor even in what he did not say, and did not do: "In all this Job sinned not." We are apt to purpose that we will shut ourselves up in our own room, and never go out into the world again, or attempt to speak or act any more. Surely that would be a great blank, and a blot upon our lives. No! No! No! We must not say, "I will speak no more in the name of the Lord." Go on speaking, go on acting, go on suffering. Breast the wave, Christian! Swim to the other shore; and may God's infinite mercy be seen in bringing you there! Crowd your life with action, and adorn it with patience, so that it shall be said "In all this he sinned not."

I should like to say somewhat to some of you who are not God's people. Suppose I were to sum up your lives, and wrote it out in this fashion: "Was fond of gaiety; spent many days in frivolous amusement; was sometimes drunken; occasionally would use profane language," and so on. How falsely would I speak if I were to say, "In all this he sinned not!" Why, in all this you have done nothing else but sin. God has loaded your tables and clothed your backs, and kept you in health, and prolonged your lives, and in all this you have done nothing else but sin and act towards God foolishly. You have been the very opposite of Job. You have sinned in all your comforts and your mercies, and have never shown due gratitude to the blessed God, but have done evil against him. The Lord bring us all to his feet, and then may he help us in all future troubles to stand firm, and not to sin. Amen and Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Struggle With a Child.*

MERELY to force one will into subjection to the other is an injury both to the one who forces and to the one who submits. A hypothetical illustration may make this matter clearer. A father says to his strong-willed child: "Johnny, shut that door." Johnny says, "I won't." The father says "You shall." Johnny rejoins, "I won't." An issue is here made between two wills—the father's and the son's. Many a parent would suppose that in such a case the child's will ought to be broken, subjugated, forced if need be, under the pressure of the father's will; and the more conscientious the parent, the firmer is likely to be his conviction of duty accordingly.

It is such a point as this that the evil of breaking a child's will, instead of training it, finds its foothold in many a Christian home. The father is determined not to yield his will to his child's will. The child is determined not to yield his will to his father's will. It is the old conflict between "an irresistible force and an immovable body." In such a case, brute force may compel the child to do that which he chooses not to do, just as the rack and thumb-screws of the Inquisition could compel the tortured one to deny a belief which he chooses to adhere to; but in one case, as in the other, the victim of the torturing pressure is permanently harmed, while the course of truth and right has been in no sense the gainer by the triumph. Oh, what if God should treat his children in that way!

What, then, it may be asked, should be done with such a child in an issue like this? It certainly would have been better, it would have been far better, for the parent not to make a direct issue by following the child's first refusal with the unqualified declaration, "You shall." But with the issue once made, however unfortunately, then what? Let the parent turn to the child in loving gentleness,—not then in severity, and never, never, never in anger,—and tell him tenderly of a better way than that which he is pursuing, urging him to a wiser, nobler choice. In most cases the very absence of any show of angry conflict on the father's part will prompt the child to choose to do that which he said he would not do. But if worst comes to worst (for we are here taking the extreme supposable issue, which ought indeed rarely, if ever to occur), let the parent say to the child: "Johnny, I shall have to give you your choice in the matter. You can either shut that door or take a whipping." Then a new choice is before the boy, and his will is free and unbroken for its meeting.

Be it understood, the father has no right to say, "I will whip you until you shut that door;" for that would be to deprive the boy of a choice, to deprive the boy of his will-power in the direction of his action: and that no parent is ever justified in doing. If the boy choose to be whipped rather than to obey, the father must accept the result so far, and begin again for the next time; although, of course there must be no undue severity in a child's punishment; even the civil law forbids that. The father as a father is not entitled to have his will stand in the place of his child's will; even though he is privileged to strive to bring the child to will in the same direction that the father's will trends.

Children Who Tease.

Susannah Wesley, the mother of John and Charles Wesley, was accustomed to say, of her children, that they all learned very early that they were not to have anything that they cried for, and so they soon learned not to cry for a thing they wanted. Who will doubt that John and Charles Wesley were stronger men, for this training, than they could have been if they were trained to look upon crying as a means of securing what was best for them? Who will doubt that Susannah Wesley was more of a woman, and more respected by her sons because of her unvarying firmness at this point, than would have been possible if she had frequently yielded to the pressure of their piteous crying for that which it was against her judgment to give them? Any parent who would apply this rule of Susannah Wesley to the matter of teasing, might be sure of a corresponding result in the children's estimate of the practical value of teasing. Any child who finds that he is never to have anything for which he teases, will quickly quit teasing. How simple this rule, for this department of child-training!

Trying a Temper.

A child knows when punishment is administered to him in anger, and when it is administered to him in a purely judicial frame of mind; and a child puts his estimate accordingly on him who administers the punishment. In a city mission school, many years ago, there was a wild set of boys who seemed to do all in their power to anger and annoy their teachers. Cases of discipline were a necessity there; for again and again a boy attempted violence to a teacher, and force was required to save the teachers from serious harm. But love swayed those teachers even when force on their part was a necessity; and the boys seemed to understand this fully.

There came a time, however, when the young superintendent of that school, who had often held a scholar in check by force, was made public sport of in such way, with the rude linking of a lady teacher's name with his in ridicule, that his self-control failed him for a moment, and he evidently showed this as he took hold of the offender with unwonted warmth. Instantly the boy started back in surprise, with the reproachful exclamation: "Trumbull, you're mad; and that's wicked." Those words taught a lesson to that young superintendent which he has never forgotten. They showed him that his power over those rough boys was a moral power, and that it pivoted on his retaining power over himself. It was theirs to get him angry if they could; but if they succeeded he was a failure, and they knew it. And that lesson is one that parents as well as superintendents could learn to advantage.

A DOUBLE CURE.

REVIVAL services were in progress in Kingston, Jamaica, and a gracious work was being done. Saints were edified, and many were added to the church. The services were conducted in the usual way, penitents being invited to the front of the auditorium after earnest exhortation. Scenes of excitement accompanied this special effort as a matter of course, and fastidious people turned up their noses at them, equally as a matter of course. Among the new converts was a young lady, the daughter of a wealthy and haughty woman, who forbade her daughter's attendance at the meetings, when she knew what had been going on and that her daughter had turned Methodist.

The young lady persisted in going to the meetings, however, and one night the mother started for the chapel with the object of bringing her home. Now it happened that the old lady was suffering at the time from a disease more or less common in the hot latitudes, the most distressing symptom of which is a great swelling of the lower limbs, which induces a very dignified carriage of the body, and is hence known as the "dandy."

With her dandified strut, the mother marched down the aisle of the meeting-house, "blood in her eye," intent only on compelling her daughter's return to the house, when the words of the preacher's exhortation arrested her attention, and she was overcome by conviction of sin. Dropping on her knees at the penitent form, she forgot her errand in her anxiety to find mercy, and before the service was concluded ed she was numbered among the converts of the evening.

Simultaneously with the recovery of her sick soul, the new believer experienced a wonderful improvement in her health, and her song of spiritual rejoicing was accompanied with the glad shout: "Bless the Lord, He has cured me of the 'dandy!' He has cured me of the 'dandy!'"

THE FLOODS IN CHINA.

THE three pictures on this page are from photographs taken in the neighborhood of Tientsin, China, during the recent inundation. The two on the left are of scenes in the country near the Yun-ting River, and the Grand Canal respectively. That on the right represents "the defence wall" thrown up to stem the flood. On the top of it may be seen the huts in which some of the homeless people have taken refuge. These "defence walls" are generally doubled at the most dangerous points, one of them being nearly a mile farther from the river than the other, so that if the first bank is swept away by the current, the second bank may protect the country, after the intervening mile has been submerged. The banks are built of earth strengthened with piles and stalks. They are usually about eighteen feet high, eighty feet wide at the base, and twenty feet at the top. "They look massive enough," says Rev. Paul Bergen, a Presbyterian Missionary in China, "but when the water hurls itself against and over them there is nothing left but ruin."

The Hwang-ho or Yellow River is the one most dreaded. The vast low-lying plains on each side of it are inundated more or less every summer owing to the melting snows and the heavy fall rains. The most hopeless feature of the calamity is that the flood brings down sand and alluvium which it deposits in its bed and thus the channel is being gradually filled up. This increases the danger and protracts it. It is only a question of a few years when the bed of the river will be as high as the surrounding country, for the Hwang-ho firmly refuses to "scour its own bed."

In some districts the silt deposited on the submerged land is four feet thick so that after the waters have retired the houses, which have not been swept away, require so many changes to be made to them that they are almost valueless. The farms, too, are often spoiled. If the river deposits alluvium, they are improved, but if, as too frequently happens, it is a layer of sand two or three feet thick that is laid on the surface, the farmer is ruined. He generally packs all he can save from the flood in a barrow puts his children on top, and followed by his wife, wheels it away to some place of safety, where he lives by begging until the flood subsides and he returns to his old home to find out what kind of farm the river has left him. Very often he dies from exposure and hardship. Mr. Bergen, the missionary before quoted, says that fifty refugees were frozen to death in one night near his station at Chinanfu. Some reach their destination, but are unable to make a living, and so beg their way back. Others return after having gone half way, and a majority succeed in establishing themselves in their new homes and make a living. The governors of Shanshi and Shenshi became alarmed at these ragged armies, desperate with want and weary of travelling, crowding over their borders, and so have prohibited further immigration. Multitudes of people remained at home, until land, houses, implements, animals, all and everything is sold for food, when they set out to beg, so that from Peking to Chining Chow, from Chefoo for a thousand miles west, the appearance of the Yellow River refugee is familiar.

The government is almost paralyzed by the extent of the calamity this year. Since August the number of homeless people is said to be counted by the million. They are found begging in all the surrounding provinces. Those who are content to remain near the scene of the calamity received from the Government a dole of bread and brown flour, and this encourages many of them to remain. The missionaries have made an appeal for help and a fund is being raised in this country and in England to furnish them with the means of aiding the unfortunate people. In the afflicted districts Christian work has had to give place to philanthropy; but there is reason to hope that the help now given will not be forgotten, but may lead to the missionary being as cordially welcomed in his capacity as a religious teacher as he is in his philanthropic character.

THE PALACE OF LOO.

THE death of the king of Holland, as already briefly mentioned in these columns, occurred on Nov. 24. He died at the Royal Palace of Loo, a picture of which is here given. It is one of the many fine buildings which are the boast of The Hague, the capital of the Netherlands. Its large library, its collection of archives, and its wonderful gallery of pictures, comprising some of the choicest works of the best Dutch painters, have made Loo famous throughout the world. But it is the historical associations of the palace which have made its name familiar to all educated people. It was there that the great William of Orange, who became William III. of England, loved to dwell. There he laid his plans for thwarting his formidable enemy, the King of France; there he received the English envoys who entreated him to go and occupy the English throne, thither he went to consult his old friends of the States General, and there in the brief intervals of his troubled life, the great king, statesman, and general, recuperated his worn and feeble physical frame and his exhausted energies.

Lord Macaulay thus pathetically describes William's homesickness and his love of the old palace: "He saved England it is true; but he never loved her, and he never obtained her love. To him she was always a land of exile, visited with reluctance, and quitted with delight. Whatever patriotic feeling he had was for Holland. There was the stately tomb where slept the great politicians whose blood, whose name, whose temperament and whose genius he had inherited. "In the gallery of Whitehall, he pined for the familiar house in the wood at The Hague and never was so happy as when he could quit the magnificence of Windsor for his far humbler seat at Loo. During his splendid banishment it was his consolation to create round him by building, planting, and digging, a scene which might remind him of the formal piles of red brick, of the long canals, and of the symmetrical flowerbeds amid which his early life had been passed."

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

WHEN Abram Hardale entered the office of Gabriel Grubb in response to the letter which had been handed to him by his niece, he found that legal individual absent on some errand connected with his craft. On the following day, therefore, he repeated his visit, and found on this occasion the man of law seated in his inner office, which he not inaptly called his "den." He was a short, thin man of middle age, wiry withal, like his reddish hair. The spectacles which bestrid his nose, or rather the place where his nose probably would have been if he had had one, were evidently constructed for very peculiar vision. When he had them on you could scarcely see his eyes at all, but only two discs of white light. These gave you the sensation of being looked into and read at sight, as though the glasses were magic crystals, and the eyes behind them belonged to a wizard of the olden time. He had a peculiar habit, this Gabriel Grubb, of listening with his head down, to what people had to say as though he was deeply engaged in pondering the construction of the floor; and then when the speaker paused, he would lift his head, fix on him the two white discs of light, pause full ten seconds, then say, "Just so."

On his lips those were two wonderful words. Sometimes they were a question; sometimes they were a sanction or endorsement; sometimes they were a sarcasm; sometimes they were the very dubiety of doubt; sometimes they amounted to a flat contradiction. He did not seem to want any more words than those two for the expression of any opinion whatever; and when he wanted to say something without expressing an opinion he said "Just so," in a sphynx-like, inconsequent sort of way, that defied the cleverest listener to attach any meaning to it at all.

When Abram Hardale was ushered in by the lean, limp clerk, who opened the door, he at once disclosed his errand by saying, "You see I am not long in responding to your letter, Gabriel Grubb." The two white discs were fixed on the old carpenter's firm-set features, as he replied, "Just so."

"I came yesterday morning, almost as soon as I got your letter, but you were out—dunning some poor fellow for somebody else's money, most likely, eh?"

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb, holding his stubby chin between his finger and thumb, and thinking to himself that such an odd fish as Hardale was, was unusually ready to bite.

"Well, now that I am here—though why I should be such a fool as to come, I can't think, for I don't like your 'Won't-you-walk-into-my-parlor' kind of business—I should like to get by a short cut at what you want with me," said the carpenter.

"Just so," said the attorney, who was quite willing to be as waspish as his visitor. "And you would like to get by a short cut at what you want, Abram Hardale, or you wouldn't have come into 'Grubb's grab'em shop.' There, you see, I know whom I have to deal with, so we can come straight to the point at once."

"Right!" said Abram, with an emphatic nod. "Coming straight to the point is my way. What's this about Hazelcroft? That's the point, isn't it?"

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb. Taking down an imposing box of japanned tin, the lawyer took out a formidable-looking document and began to read: "The Hazelcroft Estate, situated on the North boundary of the Parish of Settleworth in the North Riding of the County of York, and adjoining the parishes of Thraffton, Snebworth, and Consterdale, and containing about 510 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches, be the same more or less—"

"Hold on, Gabriel Grubb, hold on. That isn't coming to the point; or if it is, you won't get there by Christmas. All that sort of useless gibberish is only an Abracadabra of mystification to impose on honest men. Cut it short, tell me in a dozen words what Hazelcroft has to do with my niece and me. 'As the crow flies is much the nearest way to York.'"

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb, "only in this case it's Hazelcroft and not York, you want to get to; and between you and me, Abram Hardale,"—here the white discs were turned full upon him—"Hazelcroft ought to be in your niece's possession, and I can put her there. But she'll not get it as the 'crow flies.' The longest way about is often the nearest way home. You are fond of proverbs so I commend that to your careful study. A home like Hazelcroft is worth going to, even if you have to take a circumbendibus to reach it."

"Very well, then," said Abram, rising to his feet. "Our business is finished. Abram Hardale's coat-of-arms is a two-foot rule and his motto is straightforward. I go to my destination as the crow flies or not at all."

The carpenter took his hat from the dusty table—dust is closely allied with spider's webs—rubbed it off energetically, as if unwilling to take a particle along with him, and made for the door.

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb, oddly enough, "yours is a good road enough when there's nothing in the way, or when your wings are strong. I suppose you'll go home through the church." So saying he quietly arose as if to bid his visitor depart in peace.

"Through the church," said Abram Hardale, "what for? Besides, the gates are locked."

"Just so," said the lawyer, with a sly smile, "but that's the way the crow flies. A straight line from my office to your house passes directly through the church, and you don't go any other way, you know. I daresay a key would make it easy. Now there is, not exactly a church, but an obstacle, between your niece and the Hazelcroft estate. I say you can walk round it, but if you prefer to walk through it, Abram Hardale, I've got the key."

Here the two white discs were fixed again on the carpenter's grey eyes. The lawyer's hand was toying with a "charm" suspended to his heavy watch-chain, which he shook and fondled as if it were the key of which he spoke.

"Honor bright?" said Abram.

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb.

Abram Hardale looked steadily down on the white discs. They were steadily lifted to his face. He dearly wanted Nora to be mistress of Hazelcroft. He heartily disliked the thoughts of having dealings with Gabriel Grubb. "He who hesitates is lost." Abram was much given to proverbial philosophy; but that one did not enter his mind just then. He temporized, cogitated, and then resumed his seat deliberately, laid his hat once more on the thick coverlet of dust. What was the subtle influence possessed by Gabriel Grubb?

I think I can tell you what it was. It was Abram Hardale's pride and cupidity that led him to trust the lawyer after all his protests against "him and all his treacherous tribe." Abram was known to have a deadly dislike to all the legal race. And yet, here he was, vanquished by Lawyer Grubb's magic crystals and his wizard words—"just so." O dear, O dear, how easy it is to fool the wisest of us! The two conspirators remained closeted together for more than an hour. Whether the carpenter really knew much more when he went out than when he went in may very well be doubted; but he thought he did; at any rate he thought that he thought so, and those of us who are not well versed in metaphysics may well rest content with that simple explanation of his frame of mind, after being under the influence of Gabriel Grubb's white discs for one whole mortal hour.

He seemed to have arrived at six principal facts. Fact first:—That the present proprietor of Hazelcroft had no good title to the estate. Fact second:—That the Mansfords were still the rightful owners of it. Fact third:—That all the Mansford family were now dead except his niece Nora. Fact fourth:—That Nora was the rightful heir to Hazelcroft. Fact fifth:—That Gabriel Grubb could prove all this to be absolutely and indubitably true, and, Fact sixth:—That being in possession of evidence that made her claim as clear as daylight, he, Gabriel Grubb, could put Nora Mansford in full possession of Hazelcroft, and so make her the mistress of a fortune that would bring her in a good $3,000 a year.

Abram Hardale expressed his intention to gain his niece "her rights." "It is my bounden duty to attend to her interests, you know," said Abram Hardale.

"Just so," said Gabriel Grubb. "I think we have a clear case, don't you?" said Abram Hardale. "Just so," said Gabriel Grubb.

When the solicitor showed his new client to the door, the carpenter, anxious, perhaps, to have a legal assurance that should warrant him in burning his ships on the edge of the legal continent he was about to invade, asked the final question.

"Now then, honor bright, would you make this venture if you were me?" Then did Gabriel Grubb the little lift his crystal discs to the gaze of Abram Hardale the tall, and said emphatically, "Just so!"

The old carpenter carried his long, lean, stooping body home. As he went he thought of Hazelcroft, and of Nora and of George Appleton destined to be his successor in business and semi-destined in his own mind to take Nora as his wife. When his thoughts had reached this point his sardonic smile boded ill for that honest young fellow's prospects in the direction in which his heart would go.

Poor Abram! I am inclined to think that, with all his wisdom, he had never learned the proverb which saved the life of the Persian king. "Never begin that of which thou hast not well considered the end,"

The carpenter was too shrewd a man to speak of this matter of Hazelcroft to George or anyone else, but he was unusually thoughtful, and George had an idea that something unusual was on Old Crusty's mind. A few days after the talk with Grubb the young man was sauntering through the fields at eventide which was a favorite occupation of his, not only because of its restful influence, but because he was an earnest and even enthusiastic student of nature. But George was not studying nature on that day. He was thinking of Nora Mansford. More than once lately Old Crusty had spoken to him of young Towneley's evident partiality for his niece and with an absence of all sarcasm, vexation, or disapproval. Nay, on one occasion he had gone so far as to say in a half-joking, half-serious way, "Well, who knows, Nora Mansford may one day prove as good as he."

Whereupon George said to himself with an extra heart-beat by way of emphasis:

"She is that now, and infinitely better than he can be, if he lives to the age of Methuselah."

And so George Appleton sauntered and chewed the cud of unpleasant reflection as he walked; and apart from any vain desires of his own, he wondered how he could circumvent the young gentleman, whom he knew to be unworthy, not of Nora's only, but of any other maiden's confidence and love.

All unwittingly, he paused, as he laid his hand on a stile he was about to cross, and heaved a great sigh, sad and heavy as the heart it came from.

"Strong language that!" said a clear and pleasant voice that had a kindly ring in it. Looking across the stile George found himself quite unexpectedly face to face with the mysterious stranger who had lately come to the "Hermitage," and who had been the subject of a good deal of gossip in the little country town. His friendly, grey eyes were fixed upon him, as he leaned with one hand on a trusty staff, and with the other stroked his beard, which was of considerable dimensions. He repeated the words, "Strong language that, my friend. One would fain try to change such a sigh into a song. Singing is better than sighing. Pity it is that so few of us know the way to do it."

There was something winning in the stranger's tone and mien, and George found himself smiling cheerfully as he responded, "Thanks, very many thanks, for your good will, at any rate. I'm afraid I was in the blues a little."

"Was eh? Well, then, that shows I have been of some service already. If you'll accept my company homewards, who knows?—the blues may give place to rose color or, what is perhaps better, to a sedate and sober grey," said the mysterious one.

Nothing loth, George Appleton turned to accompany him, and so it was that Richard Mansford obtained the coveted opportunity of putting the young carpenter under inspection for his niece Nora's sake.

"I say, young man," said he, striking the end of his stout staff upon the ground in his excitement, "What right had you to sigh as you did just now? What reason is there in it? How dare you? I should think the God of the daisies is equal to all your needs, eh? They are looking at you now by the thousand to suggest to you the Goodness that can hush your sighs and meet your needs whatever and how many soever they may be."

"True," said George reverently; "The Master himself taught the same lesson—'Are ye not much better than they?' My sigh, however, which seems to have impressed you was for another, and not for myself."

The shrewd stranger began to stroke his beard; a movement which seemed usual to him in his more thoughtful moments.

"Well," he said, genially, after a moment's pause, "Has God given us no warrant for hope and help for those in whom we are interested?"

Here his keen, yet kindly grey eyes were fixed on George's face; and when that young fellow met his gaze, his face involuntarily flushed a confession of the secret he would fain conceal.

"But here we are at my own gate. I don't often permit myself the pleasure of receiving company at the 'Hermitage,' but if you will come in, I shall be very glad."

"No, thank you," said George "I have already transgressed in staying beyond my usual hour. If I stay longer, then the best mother in the world would be making a moonlight excursion in search of a lost son, so good night, Mr.—?"

"Magrath," said the unknown with a smile, as he noted George's inquiring look. I forgot that we were not properly introduced. Out yonder in the b—. By the way," he said, shortly, as if unwilling to pursue that sentence further, "I did not catch your name."

"George Appleton," was the reply. "And now again good-night, with many thanks for a very pleasant walk, though a sigh brought it about."

"Mr. Magrath," as he had chosen to call himself, entered the gateway, saying to himself:

"George Appleton, you'll do."

BEAR ON, MAN! SWEAR ON!

Years ago the attention of the people was attracted by the drawbridge at Hull, England, which was raised by hearing a man on a barge in a most awful manner. A minister spoke to him, but without effect, and the bystanders waiting till he went down had to submit to the wounds. Presently a Quaker came with a loud voice called out, "on, man; swear on." The Minister expressed surprise that he should call a man who was blaspheming so to swear on. The Quaker said he had heard there was a great deal of bad language used by the man, and he wanted it to come from his mouth. Whether it was the oddness of the Quaker or whether the conscience of the man was touched, he was silent from that time. Instead of replying with abuse, he had been expected. Many months later one of the bystanders met the man at Hull, and asked him if he remembered when he was swearing to the drawbridge when the Quaker called him. "Yes, I do," he said; "and I have never passed my lips since." He had afterwards that the boatman had come an altered man, and the beginning of his change dated from the time the Quaker's strange advice arrested his attention.

FRANCE'S TREMENDOUS ARMY.

The total effective infantry of France consists of 162 active regiments or 486,000 men; 145 mixed regiments or 435,000 men; and 145 territorial regiments or 435,000 men. Added to these the Chasseurs, Zouaves, Algerian auxiliaries, Legion, and Marine infantry, it is estimated that out of the grand total thus far France can count not less than 1,000,000 men. That is, more than three hundred thousand men! That is, more than three hundred thousand men! That is, more than three hundred thousand men! Only five years after the war of 1870-71, and the recovery of France from that war, and the tremendous efforts which were then making to reorganize and retrain the army caused Bismarck and Moltke to say: "We shall have to be ready to despatch Lorraine for fifty years." And in 1890, this little sentence confronts the strategist, Moltke, the only one of the three since the death of the old emperor, and the political demise of Bismarck. A Political journal remarks on this matter: "There will be no Sedan six years after the beginning of the next war!"

CHILD SACRIFICED IN AFRICA.

McKITTRICK, a missionary at Luanda, writes: "While at breakfast a large party of mourners, going to a dissection to bury a child who died yesterday. The women were crying and wailing, and the continual noise on the drum was proclaiming to all the intelligence of the child's death. This of itself was only a small part of the sorrow. In the midst of the canoe was a healthy living child, and the dead body was laid, and as thus being taken to her own grave. To know what heathenism is in all its broad reality one must be brought in contact with it. The mere reading of the Bible is enough to awaken horror, and pity; but we realize the meaning of these terrible acts of cruelty when we see them perpetrated day by day before our eyes."

IF WE HAD BUT A DAY.

We should fill the hours with the sweetest things,
If we had but a day;
We should drink alone at the purest springs
In our upward way;
We should love with a life-time's love in an hour
If the hours were few;
We should rest, not for dreams, but for fresher power,
To be and to do.

We should guide our wayward or wearied wills
By the clearest light;
We should keep our eyes on the heavenly hills
If they lay in sight;
We should trample the pride and the discontent
Beneath our feet;
We should take whatever a good God sent
With a trust complete.

We should waste no moments in weak regret,
If the day were but one;
If what we remember and what we forget Went out with the sun;
We should be from our clamorous selves set free
To work or to pray,
And to be what the Father would have us be,
If we had but a day.

—Mary Lowe Dickinson.

ACROSS MOUNT LEBANON.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED LAST SUNDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1890, AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" SERVICE IN THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A Stage Ride Up the Mountain—A Grove of Cedars—A Throne of Foliage Eighty Feet High—Punishment for Reckless Felling—Biblical References to the Cedar—Its Characteristics Typical—Deeply Rooted—Wide-Branches Christianity—The Growth in Bracing Air—The Hardships of Cedar-like Characters—The Fall of a Cedar—A Merciless Merchant—The Over-topping Cedar—The Tree of Life.

"The cedars of Lebanon which he hath planted." Ps. 104:16.

our journey we change stirrup for wheel. It is four o'clock in the morning, at Damascus, Syria, and we are among the lanterns of the hostelry waiting for the stage to start. A Mohammedan in high life is putting his three wives on board within an apartment by themselves, and our party occupy the main apartment of one of the most uncomfortable vehicles in which mortals were ever jammed and half-strangled. But we must not let the discomforts annul or disparage the opportunities. We are rolling on and out and up the mountains of Lebanon, their forehead under a crown of snow which coronet the fingers of the hottest summer cannot cast down. We are ascending heights around which is garlanded much of the finest poesy of the Scriptures, and are rising toward the mightiest dominion that botany ever recognized, reigned over by the most imperial tree that ever swayed a leafy sceptre—the Lebanon cedar; a tree eulogized in my text as having grown from a nut put into the ground by God himself, and no human hand had anything to do with its planting: "The cedars of Lebanon which he hath planted."

The average height of this mountain is seven thousand feet, but in one place, it lifts its head to an altitude of ten thousand. No higher than six thousand feet can vegetation exist, but below that line at the right season, are vineyards and orchards, and olive groves, and flowers that dash the mountain side with a very carnage of color, and fill the air with aromatics that Hosea, the prophet, and Solomon, the king, celebrated as "the smell of Lebanon." At a height of six thousand feet is a grove of cedars, the only descendants of those vast forests from which Solomon cut his timber for the temple at Jerusalem, and where at one time there were one hundred thousand axemen hewing out the beams from which great cities were constructed. But this nation of trees has by human iconoclasm been massacred until only a small group is left. This race of giants is nearly extinct, but I have no doubt that some of these were here when Hiram, King of Tyre, ordered the assassination of those cedars of Lebanon which the Lord planted. From the multitude of uses to which it may be put and the employment of it in the Scriptures, the cedar is the divine favorite. When the plains to be seen from the window of this stage in which we ride to-day are parched under summer heats, and not a grass-blade survives the fervidity, this tree stands in luxuriance, defying the summer sun. And when the storms of winter terrify the earth, and hurl the rocks in avalanche down this mountain side, this tree grapples the hurricane of snow in triumph, and leaves the spent fury at its feet. From sixty to eighty feet high are they, the horizontal branches of great sweep with their burden of leaves needle-shaped, the top of the tree pyramidal, a throne of foliage on which might, and splendor, and glory sit. But so continuously has the extermination of trees gone on, that for the most part the mountains of Lebanon are bare of foliage, while I am sorry to say, the earth in all lands is being likewise denuded.

The axe is slaying the forests all round the earth. To stop the slaughter God opened the coal mines of England, and Scotland, and America, and the world, practically saying by that: "Here is fuel; as far as possible let my trees alone." And by opening for the human race the great quarries of granite, and showing the human family how to make brick, God is practically saying: "Here is building material; let my trees alone." We had better stop the axes among the Adirondacks. We had better stop the axes in all our forests, as it would have been better for Syria if the axes had long ago been stopped among the mountains of Lebanon. To punish us for our reckless assault on the forests, we have the disordered seasons: now the drouths because the uplifted arms of the trees do not pray for rain, their presence according to all scientists disposing the descent of the showers; and then we have the cyclones and the hurricanes multiplied in number and velocity because there is nothing to prevent their awful sweep.

Plant the trees in your parks that the weary may rest under them. Plant them along your streets that up though the branches passers-by may see the God who first made the trees and then made man to look at them. Plant them along the brooks, that under them children may play. Plant them in your gardens, that as in Eden the Lord may walk there in the cool of the day. Plant them in cemeteries, their shade like a mourner's veil, and their leaves sounding like the rustle of the wings of the departed. Let Arbor Day or the day for the planting of trees, recognized by the legislatures of many of the States, be observed by all our people, and the next one hundred years do as much in planting these leafy glories of God, as the last one hundred years have accomplished in their destruction. When, not long before his death, I saw on the banks of the Hudson in his glazed cap, riding on horseback, George P. Morris, the great son-writer of America, I found him grandly emotional, and I could understand how he wrote "Woodman, spare that tree!" the verses which many of us have felt like quoting in a belligerent spirit, when under the stroke of some one without sense or reason we saw a beautiful tree prostrated:

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.
'Twas my forefather's hand
That placed it near his cot;
There, woodman, let it stand,
Thy axe shall harm it not.

My heart-strings round thee cling,
Close as thy bark, old friend!
Here shall the wild bird sing,
And still thy branches bend,
Old tree! The storm still brave!
And woodman, leave the spot;
While I've a hand to save,
Thy axe shall harm it not.

As we ride along on these mountains of Lebanon, we bethink how its cedars spread their branches, and breathe their aroma, and cast their shadows all through the Bible. Solomon discoursed about them in his botanical works, when he spoke of trees "from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." The psalmist says: "The righteous shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon," and in one of his magnificent doxologies calls on the cedars to praise the Lord. And Solomon says the countenance of Christ is excellent as the cedars, and Isaiah declares, "The day of the Lord shall be upon all the cedars of Lebanon." And Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, and Amos, and Zephaniah, and Zechariah, weave its foliage into their sublimest utterances.

As we ride over Lebanon to-day, there is a howling wind sweeping past and a dash of rain, all the better enabling us to appreciate that description of a tempest, which no doubt was suggested by what David had seen with his own eyes among these heights, for as a soldier, he carried his wars clear up to Damascus, and such a poet as he, I warrant, spent many a day on Lebanon. And perhaps while he was seated on this very rock against which our carriage jolts, he wrote that wonderful description of a thunderstorm: "The voice of the Lord is powerful. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. Yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. He maketh them also to skip like a calf, Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire."

As the lion is the monarch of the fields, and behemoth the monarch of the waters, the cedar is the monarch of the trees. And I think one reason why it is so glorified all up and down the Bible, is because we need more of its characteristics in our religious life. We have too much of the willow, and are easily bent this way or that; too much of the aspen, and we tremble under every zephyr of assault; too much of the bramble-tree, and our sharp points sting and wound; but not enough of the cedar, wide-branched, and heaven-aspiring, and tempest-grappling. But the reason these cedars stand ell is that they are deep-rooted. They run anchors down into the caverns of the mountain and fasten to the very foundations of earth, and twist around and clinch themselves on the other side of the deepest layer of rock they can reach. And that is the difference between Christians who stand and Christians who fall. It is the difference between a superlative character, and one that has clutched its hold deep down around and under the Rock of Ages.

One of the Lebanon cedars was examined by a scientist, and from its concentric circles it was found to be thirty-five hundred years old, still standing, and there is such a thing as everlasting strength, and such a staunchness of Christian character that all time and all eternity lead of being its demolition shall be its opportunity. Not such are those vacillating Christians who are so pious on Sunday that they have no religion left for the week day. As the anaconda gorges itself with food, and then ans for a long while to be thorough-sensible, there are some who will on Sunday such a religious sur- that the of the k, they em thor- hly dead all relig- emotion. ey weep church ler a char- sermon, t if on nday a bject of nt pre- its itself at door, the gar's safe- will de- entirely quick bs and an obstructed rway. It es all the ace they get to p them om com- ting as- lt and bat- y on those truders, to come the pale faces and stories of distress and description papers. The reason that God planted these cedars in the Bible was to suggest to us that we ought, in our religious character, to be deep like the cedar, high like the cedar, broad-branched as the cedar. A traveller measured the spread of the boughs of one of these cedars and found it one hundred and eleven feet from branch tip to branch tip, and I have seen elders of Christian character that through their prayers, and charities put out one branch to the remotest parts of America, and another branch to the uttermost parts of Asia, and these wide-branched Christians will keep on multiplying till all the earth is overshadowed with mercy. But mark you, these cedars of Lebanon could not grow if planted in mild climates and in the air, and in carefully watered gardens. They must have the gymnasium of the midnight African to develop their arms. They must be the athlete with a thousand winters before their feet are rightly planted, and their forearms rightly lifted, and their arms rightly wielded. And if their be any other way for developing strong Christian character except by storms of trouble, I never heard of it.

Call the roll of martyrs, call the roll of the prophets, call the roll of the Apostles, and see which of them had an easy time of it. Which of these cedars grew in the warm valley? Not one of them. Honeysuckles thrive best on the south side of the house, but cedars in a Syrian whirlwind. Men and women who hear this or read this, instead of your grumbling because you have it hard, thank God that you are in just the best school for making heroes and heroines. It is true both for this world and the next. Rock that baby in a cradle cushioned and canopied; graduate him from that into a costly high chair and give him a gold spoon; send him to school wrapped in furs enough for an arctic explorer; send him through a college where he will not have to study in order to get a diploma, because his father is rich; start him in a profession where he begins with an office the floor covered with Axminster, and a library of books in Russian morocco, and an arm-chair upholstered like a throne, and an embroidered

After a while a position on salary or wages small enough to keep life, but keep it at its lowest ebb. Starting in occupation or business with prosperous men trying to fight you back at every step. But after a good while fairly on your feet, and your opportunities widening, and then by some sudden turn you are triumphant. You are master of the situation, and defiant of all earth and hell. A Lebanon cedar! John Milton on his way up to the throne of the world's sacred poesy, must sell his copyright of Paradise Lost for seventy-two dollars in three payments. And William Shakespeare on his way up to be acknowledged the greatest dramatist of all ages, must hold horses at the door of the London theatre for a sixpence, and Homer must struggle through total blindness to immortality, and John Bunyan must cheer himself on the way up by making a flute out of his prison stool, and Canova the sculptor must toil on through orphanage, modelling a lion in butter before he could cut his statues in marble.

And the great Stephen must watch cows in the field for a few pennies and then become a stoker, and afterward mend clocks before he puts the locomotive on its track and calls forth plaudits from parliaments, and medals from kings. Abel Stevens is picked up a neglected child of the street, and rises through his consecrated genius to be one of the most illustrious clergymen and historians of the century. And Bishop Jones of the same church in boyhood worked his passage from Ireland to ottoman upon which to put his twelve-dollar gaiters, and then lay upon his table the best ivory cigar-holder you can import from Brussels, and have standing outside his door a prancing span that won the prize at the Horse Fair, and leave him estate enough to make him independent of all struggle, and what will become of him? If he do not die early of inanition or dissipation, he will live a useless life, and die an unlamented death and go into a fool's eternity.

But what has been the history of most of the great cedars in merchandise, in art, in law, in medicine, in statesmanship, in Christian usefulness? "John get up and milk the cows; it's late; it's half past five in the morning. Split an armful of wood on your way out so that we can build the fires for breakfast. Put your bare feet on the cold oilcloth, and break the ice in your pitcher before you can wash. Yes; it has been snowing and drifting again last night, and we will have to break the roads." The boys educational advantages, a long oak plank without any back to it, in country school-house, and stove throwing out more smoke than heat. Pressing on from one hardship to another,

America, and up to a usefulness, where in the bishopric, he was second to no one who ever adorned it.

While in banishment Xenophon wrote his Anabasis and Thucydides his "History of the Peloponnesian War," and Victor Hugo must be exiled for many years to the island of Guernsey before he can come to that height in the affections of his countrymen, that crowds Champs Elysees, and, the adjoining boulevards with one million mourners, as his hearse rolls down to the Church of the Madeleine. Oh, it is a tough old world and it will keep you back and keep you down, and keep you under as long as it can. Hail, sons and daughters of the fire!

Stand, as the anvil when the stroke of stalwart men falls fierce and fast.
Storms but more deeply root the oak whose brawny arms embrace the blast.
Stand like an anvil; noise and heat are born of earth and die with time;
The soul, like God, its source and seat, is solemn, still, serene, sublime.

Thirty years from now the foremost men in all occupations and professions will be those who are this hour in awful struggle of early life, many of them without five dollars to their name. So in spiritual life it takes a course of bereavements, persecutions, sicknesses, and losses to develop stalwart Christian character. I got a letter a few days ago, saying: "I have hardly seen a well day since I was born, and I could not write my own name until I was fifty years of age and I am very poor, but I am, by the grace of God, the happiest man in Chicago."

JOHN BUNYAN IN JAIL.

The Bible speaks of the snows of Lebanon, and at this season of the year the snows there must be tremendous. The deepest snow ever seen in America would be insignificant compared with the mildest winter of snows on those Lebanon mountains.

The cedars catch that skyfull of crystals on their brow and on their long arms. Piled up in great hefts are those snows, enough to crush other trees to the ground, splitting the branches from the trunk and leaving them rent and torn never to rise. But what do the cedars care for these snows on Lebanon? They look up to the winter skies and say: "Snow on! Empty the white heavens upon us, and when this storm is passed, let other processions of tempest try to bury us in their fury. We have for five hundred winters been accustomed to this, and for the next five hundred winters we will cheerfully take all you have to send, for that is the way we develop our strength, and that is the way we serve God and teach all ages how to endure and conquer." So I say: Good cheer to all people who are snowed under. Put your faith in God and you will come out gloriously. Others may be stunted growths, or weak junipers on the lower levels of spirituality, but you are going to be Lebanon cedars. At last it will be said of such as you: "These are they who came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

But while crossing over these mountains of Lebanon I bethink myself of what an exciting scene it must be when one of the cedars does fall. It does not go down like other trees with a slight crackle that hardly makes the woodsman look up, or a hawk flutter from a neighboring bough. When a cedar falls it is the great event in the calendar of the mountains. The axemen fly. The wild beasts slink to their dens. The partridges swoop to the valley for escape. The neighboring trees go down under the awful weight of the descending monarch. The rocks are moved out of their places, and the earth trembles as from miles around all the ravines send back their sympathetic echoes. Crash! Crash! Crash! So when the great cedars of worldly or Christian influence fall, it is something terrific. Within the past few years how many mighty and overtopping men have gone down. There seems now to be an epidemic of moral disaster. The moral world, the religious world, the political world, the commercial world are quaking with the fall of Lebanon cedars. It is awful. We are compelled to cry out with Zechariah, the prophet, "Howl fir-trees for the cedar is fallen!" Some of the smaller trees are glad of it. When some great dealer in stocks goes down, the small dealers clap their hands and say "Good for him!" When a great political leader goes down the small politicians clap their hands and say "Just as I expected!" When a great minister of religion falls, many little ministers laugh up their sleeves and think themselves somehow advantaged. Ah, beloved brethren, no one makes anything out of moral shipwreck. Not a willow by the rivers of Damascus, not a sycamore on the plains of Jericho, not an olive tree in all Palestine is helped by the fall of a Lebanon cedar. Better weep and pray and tremble and listen to Paul's advice to the Galatians when he lessons to complete that education. The father means were exhausted, and great was his anxiety to help his daughter through her felonious act. He took some money from his employer, and going home to his daughter said, "There is the money to complete your musical education. The wife and mother suspected something wrong, and obtained from her husband the whole story, and that night went around with her husband to the merchant's house and surrendered the whole amount of the money. He asked for forgiveness. Forgiveness was denied, and the man was arrested. The judge, knowing all the circumstances and that the money had all been returned, suggested the merchant had better let the matter drop for the sake of the wife and the daughter. No! He would not let it drop, and he did all he could to make the case conspicuous and blasting. The judge says that afterward the same inexorable merchant was before him for breaking the law of the land. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall. No congratulation, but tears when a cedar is fallen."

says "Considering thyself lest thou also be tempted." No man is safe until he is dead, unless he be divinely protected. A greater thinker than Lord Francis Bacon, the world never saw, and he changed the world's mode of thinking for all time, his Novum Organum, a miracle of literature. With thirty-eight thousand dollars salary, and estates worth millions, and from the highest judicial bench of the world, he goes down under the power of bribery and confessed his crime and was sentenced to the Tower, and the scorn of centuries. Howl fir-tree for the cedar is fallen!

Warren Hastings, rising until he became Governor-General of India, and the envy of the chief public men of his day, plunges into cruelties against the barbaric people he had been sent to rule, until his name is chiefly associated with the criminal trial in Westminster Hall where upon him came the anathemas of Sheridan, Fox, Edmund Burke, the English nation, and all time. Howl fir-trees for the cedar is fallen! As eminent instances of moral disaster are found in our own land and our own time, instances that I do not recite lest I wound the feelings of those now alive to mourn the shipwreck. Let your indignation against the fallen turn to pity. A judge in one of our American courts gives this experience, In a respectable him that standeth take heed lest he fall. No congratulation, but tears when a cedar is fallen."

Yet there is one cedar of Lebanon that always and always will overtop all others. It is the Christ whom Ezekiel describes as a good cedar and says: "Under it shall come all fowls of every wing." Make your nest in that great cedar. Then let the storms beat and the earthquake, and time end, and eternity begin, all shall be well.

In my journey up and down Palestine and Syria nothing more impressed me than the trees—the terebinths, the sycamores, the tamarisks, the oleanders, the mulberries, the olives, the myrtles, the palms, the cedars—all of them emblematic of so much of the Scriptures. At the time is coming when, through an improvement in arboriculture, the round world shall be circumsferenced, engirdled, embosomed, emparadised in shade trees, and fruit trees, and flower trees. Isaiah declares in one place "The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it," and in another place, "All the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree. Instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree." Oh, grandest arborescence of a time. Begin! Begin!

I am so glad that the Holy Land of heaven like the Holy Land of Palestine and Syria, is at place for trees, an orchard of them, a ve of them, a forest of them. Saint John River, and every month they yielded a great p of fruit. You know what an imposing appearance trees give to a city on earth, but how exalts my idea of heaven when Saint John cribes the city on high as having its streets its rivers lined with them. Oh, the trees!

trees! The jasper walls, the fountains, the ples were not enough. There would have n something wanting yet. So to complete that pomp and splendor, I behold the upnching trees of life. Not like those stripped es now around us, which like banished astrels through the long winter night utter ir dolorous lament, or in the blast moan like t spirits wandering up and down the gale, their leaf shall never wither. Whether you autifully suggestive: "Let us cross over and

PROFESSOR KOCH.

Eminent Physician of Berlin, who is Believed to have Discovered a cure for Consumption.

ON the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is a portrait of the eminent physician, with whose name all the civilizworld is ringing. As briefly mentioned om time to time in our news columns, Professor Koch has made a discovery which, he s reason to hope, may prove an effectual cure r consumption if applied in its early stages.
as now appears probable, his hope will be alized, it will be a boon to the world which ly those can fully appreciate, who have seen me dearly loved relative fall a prey to the ead destroyer. They have seen the physician ake his head hopelessly and say, "It is consumption," and when that diagnosis has been oved correct, hope has been abandoned; for e victim, no matter how wealthy or how precious, has been regarded as inevitably doomed a lingering death. To such victims and to ose who love them, the news of Prof. Koch's scovery will be the gladdest tidings that could e proclaimed.

Robert Koch was born at Klausthal, in Gerany, on December 11, 1843. He is therefore ow forty-seven years of age. From 1862 to 66 he studied medicine at the University of ottingen. On taking his degree he became sistant-surgeon in the General Hospital at amburg, and afterwards practised privately at angenhagen, in Hanover, and at Rackewitz, in osen. In 1872, having been appointed District-urgeon at Wallstein, in Bomst, he began his acteriological investigation, which soon made m famous and led to his being appointed a ember of the Imperial Board of Health. About is time he discovered the "Farbenmethod," e color method of microscopical investigation, y which he, in 1882, discovered the tubercle acillus. This he was able to breed outside the odies of animals, and by its means he produced tuberculosis in animals. In 1883 he was apointed a Privy Councillor, and the direction of e German Cholera Commission, which visited gypt and India, was committed to his hands.
here, he discovered the so-called "comma" holera bacillus, and was rewarded with a ift of 100,000 marks (about $25,000). Two years ter he went to France to make further in-estigations in regard to the cholera bacillus, nd on his return was appointed Professor of e newly-founded Institute of Hygiene in erlin. Since then he has devoted himself nceasingly to the study of bacteriology.

The science of bacteriology received its first mpetus, if it did not originate, in the discovery 1850, of Dr. Davaine, a French physician, that the blood of animals who died from certain diseases there were "little sticks" or micro-scopical algæ. Pollinder in Germany saw them about the same time and published a description of them. Other discoveries soon followed:

many intellects were suddenly illuminated by the wonderful key this furnished to the mysteries of disease, and the result was that different microbes were successively discovered for the different contagious diseases. The simplicity and truth of the new doctrines quickly impressed a large number of methodic investigators, although at first many physicians opposed the doctrine, denying the existence of microbes, and subsequently, when they saw them for themselves, maintaining that they were not the cause of disease, but were developed through disease in the bodies of human beings or animals. The fallacy of this argument was made apparent by experiments which demonstrated that the pure culture of the same microbe always brought about the same disease, and this fact being indisputably proved, the ranks of the opponents were thinned, and savants all over the world began to study disease from the new standpoint.

Another step was taken when Pasteur discovered the way to render these microscopical germs harmless. He found that their power could be attenuated by exposing them to the air. The fresh microbes if injected into an animal produced the disease and killed the animal, but the attenuated microbe produced only a mitigated form of the disease, from which it recovered. The thought occurred to him that the principle of vaccination might apply in that case; and he tested it by injecting fresh microbes which would kill, into an animal which had undergone the injection of the attenuated microbe. The animal bore the injection and survived, though other animals which had not undergone the prior injection were killed by the same microbes. Thus the principle was established which has been so successfully applied by Pasteur to the prevention of hydrophobia.

Dr. Koch applied himself to the study of the microbe found in the tubercles on the lungs in cases of consumption, and in August last he announced at the International Medical Congress at Berlin that after repeated failures he had found a substance capable of checking the growth of the consumption bacillus in the human body. This is a lymph consisting of a brownish transparent fluid, which is by its own properties proof against deterioration. The curative lymph does not operate through the stomach, and therefore has to be applied by an injection under the skin. The place selected for applying the injection is the skin of the back between the shoulder-blades and in proximity to the lungs. The consumptive patient after receiving the first injection has a shivering fit, and the temperature of the body rises; there are pains in the limbs and an increase of the cough. After twelve hours these symptoms subside, and the patient feels as well as before the injection was administered. Other injections are made at regular intervals until there is a prospect that the disease is eradicated.

Dr. Koch speaks cautiously of his discovery and warns the public that a sufficient time has not elapsed since it was made, to prove conclusively that it does cure consumption even in its earliest stage. He is sanguine but not yet sure. Nevertheless the experiments so far made have showed results so surprising that physicians from all lands have flocked to Berlin to study the treatment. There are nearly two thousand foreign physicians now there according to the reports. Some of the lymph has also been brought to this country and several consumptive patients have been treated with it.
Dr. Koch refuses to disclose his method of preparing it lest unskillful or careless practitioners may attempt to prepare it, and their failure may bring it into disrepute. The announcement is made, however, that the secrecy will not be kept up for sordid objects, but the lymph will be sold at a price within the means of the poorest sufferer. It is now to be obtained by physicians from Dr. Libbertz, 28 Luene-burger Strasse, Berlin.

A Woman's Sacrifice for her Country is Described in press dispatches from Russia. They state that a girl named Sophie Guenzburg has been arrested as a nihilist and condemned to death. Her father is a large landowner in a south Russian village. His daughter's unusual beauty and brilliant talents suggested the expectation that she would marry some man of high degree. He therefore gave her the best education obtainable in his section. He intended sending her to the University in St. Petersburg to study; but just as she had passed the preliminary examination and was ready to go, an edict of the Czar closed the University against women. Sophie was so grievously disappointed that she was sent to Germany to study. There she distinguished herself. But she also imbibed revolutionary doctrines and she determined after graduating to return to Russia to propagate them. She obtained a position on her return as a school-teacher believing that she could serve her country in no more effective way than promoting the education of the boys, and encouraging in them patriotism and aspirations after liberty. The police soon heard of what she was doing and she only escaped arrest then by flight. She went to Switzerland, where she was safe; but love of her country drew her irresistably back into danger. She returned and in order to divert suspicion, she made the supreme sacrifice of her good name. She registered herself as a vicious woman, though she was pure and remains pure now. So branded she was an object of contempt and, not being watched, was able to disseminate her revolutionary doctrines. After being at work a year, she was detected and has been sentenced to be hanged. It must have cost so noble a woman a severe struggle to surrender her good name, but she loved her country better than herself.
Her story has thrilled the whole world with admiration of her self-sacrifice and moves even men who hear with indifference the story of him who "made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant" that he might save them from death. (Phil. 2: 7.)

A Tragic Temperance Lesson is Found in the case of the inebriated wife of a hardworking farm-manager near Rahway, N. J., whose inordinate love of liquor has sacrificed one life, and brought herself to the verge of the grave.
The woman had three pretty children, and,
but for the slavish vice to which she was addicted, might have had one of the happiest homes in the State. After long terms of sobriety, she would suddenly take to drinking, and while in her cups, would wander away from home to the neighboring woods. A few days ago she set out to walk to Rahway, taking with her little five-year-old Hannah, the golden-haired pet of the family. The temptation returned to the weak mother, and in Rahway she bought two bottles of whiskey. These she began drinking on the road, and in her stupid condition she wandered off with the child from the main highway. For three days she plodded about in drunken fashion among the snow and ice, never at any time more than a mile or two from home. A search was made and the two were found at last by the searchers, under a tree, a short distance from the road, all covered with snow. Little Hannah was dead, and the besotted mother unconscious and badly frozen. She will recover, but may lose the use of her lower limbs.
She is said to have been a kind and affectionate mother when not under the influence of liquor and the fact that she could be oblivious of her child's sufferings and indifferent to her danger and her own, shows how brutalizing that influence is. All the remainder of her life she will have to deplore that she did not heed the warning of the wise king. (Prov. 23: 29, 35.)

THE INSPIRATION OF THE ADVENT.

An Address by Rev. E. T. Hiscox, at the Recent Brooklyn Conference.

THE faiths men cherish mould their characters, and control their lives. Whether the object of such faiths be human or divine, they still work, with a silent pervasive force in him who believes, slowly but surely transforming the subject into the likeness of the object in whom that faith reposes. The transformation is in force and degree proportioned to the objective power of attraction which commands and holds them, and the subjective energy with which they work. A mere intellectual belief re-acts, and leaves its impression; the mind alone, or chiefly, directing its processes and fixing its habits of thought. But there is a deeper, more profound, more potent faith of the heart; "for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness." This faith, therefore, which through the operation of the Holy Spirit subordinates the heart, and brings the affections into the obedience of Christ, is the faith that works by love. Faith is no miracle, but it is a mystery in both its nature and operation. There is no saving efficacy in an act of faith, only as in it, the Spirit reveals Christ to the soul, and creates it anew in his image, giving it the ability to accept him, love him, rely on him, and obey him. Thus the saint and his Saviour are brought into a mystical, but vital union with each other, the divine making its impress on the human, through this subtle and sacred bond; while the soul, hid with Christ in God, lives its life in the flesh, by the faith of the Son of God, who loved it and died for it. By faith, Christ becomes "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." All this is

A Revelation to the Soul, and its transforming power works; for they all who contemplate the divine mystery of the new creation, realized within themselves, with open face, "beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord."

The faiths men cherish mould their characters and control their lives. This is particularly true as to their beliefs in the supernatural and divine. We grow toward our ideals. It is the constitution of our nature. Even friends in the intimacy of long-continued and loving fellowship, impress themselves on each other, till they become alike in thought and feeling, and manner and expression; almost in looks. The moral standards of the world are largely fixed by the character of the deities they worship, as they conceive them. It took the world four thousand years to learn that God was love, and only learned it then from him who came forth from the bosom of the Father to teach it and to preach peace on earth and good will to men. Then the moral code was changed, the world had a new ideal. Who can say that the reverential contemplation of that ideal shall not draw the moral instincts of unbiassed minds to an imitation of it? This ideal was realized in but one actual life in human history. Shall the world never have another? Shall that mystery of all ages, that marvel of the universe never be repeated?

Oh, That He Might Return!

Not shrouded in suffering mortality, but with unveiled glory, the glory he had with the Father before the world was. Shall the world never see that radiant form—that unveiled glory? Yes; every eye shall see him. The divine One shall come—is coming. That is fixed by the sure word of promise. On that rock rests our faith. He is coming to ransom his weary and waiting Church—to claim his waiting Bride. He is coming as a victorious chieftain comes to his courageous but exhausted squadrons, overborne by numbers, disheartened by treachery, as well as by deception and malice. His presence on the field of battle shall reanimate the fainting and the fearful. His trumpet-call shall gather the scattered forces and reform the broken columns; and the long-delayed victory shall crown him, who in righteousness doth judge and make war, and on whose vesture and thigh are written, King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Who can tell what morning the white banner of the Coming King may be seen floating in the grey dawn of the eastern sky, bringing in Zion's long-expected day of redemption? Our eyes are yet to see the King in his beauty, walking the earth he came to save; than the poet's fancy ever painted when this wrecked and wretched world shall receive its long-absent Lord. We shall see it, whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth. We shall see his parousia; we shall see him, whom having not seen we love. He shall stand among men, not in lordly kingship only, but in loving fellowship as well. Now, if, as we have said, the faiths men cherish mould their characters and control their lives, what can make the soul more grand and lordly, what can fashion the character to a loftier type, of virtue, or shape the life to nobler deed, than faith in, and familiar contemplation of, these sacred and inspiring realities?

We Shall See Stranger Things

It is an inspiration to Christian endeavor after increased holiness, a more complete conformity to Christ in spirit and in life. By holiness I do not here mean that misty, subtle, intangible thing, which captivates the fancy and plays with the emotions, but that conformity to the divine standard of right which makes a man to be right and to do right—rectitude of character and of life. It is not possible that one can live in the joyful expectation of meeting his Lord and Saviour without an earnest endeavor to please him and be like him. "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." The saints shall bear his likeness when he shall be manifested, but in the meantime they are striving to become like him even here. "And now little children abide in him; that when he shall be manifested we may have boldness and not be ashamed before him at his coming." This is the first lesson which faith presents, "teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

It is also an inspiration to Christian endeavor for the promotion of

before he comes to take possession of it. The kingdom of God is as a certain nobleman who went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. Delivering to his servants their commission and their capital to be invested, he said: "Occupy till I come." "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Could there be any greater incentive to faithful obedience, to energetic activity than the knowledge of the fact that the absent Lord having received his kingdom would return and take account of his servants. It is the evil servant who says: "My Lord delayeth his coming," who becomes negligent of duty. While we arrogate nothing to ourselves, and claim no commendation for works of faith and labors of love, but rather sorrow that a faith so sublime has wrought so ineffectually in those who believe, yet we can appeal to the unanswerable logic of facts as to the power of that blessed hope. From the apostles down, all along the dreary track of the world's history, there has been one illustrious and unbroken line of workers and sufferers for Christ's sake, whose inspiration and comfort amidst their trials and toils has been the assurance of hope in Christ's second coming and personal reign with his saints on the earth. They did not expect that his coming would be welcomed in a Millennium accomplished, but that he would come to inaugurate it. And there are now on the world's great harvest-field, both at home and abroad, no more faithful and consecrated and successful Christian workers, than those who cherish the hope of the Pre-Millennial advent of the absent, but surely coming Lord.

It is asked; "Then is not the Gospel a failure if it is not to convert the world?" Christ commanded the Gospel to be preached to all nations, but gave no promise of its immediate or remote result except that those who believed should be saved. It was to be preached among all nations for a witness and a testimony unto them. Every one who believed should be saved, and thus a people prepared for the Lord. The duty of God's people is plain, based on the unquestioned authority of his command and not on the possible or probable results of Christian labor. For the conversion of the world the Churches are not made responsible; that is the divine prerogative. But for the giving of the Gospel to the world they are responsible, since that they can do, and that they are commanded to do.

ROBERT OWEN'S PROBLEM.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Dec. 22, "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Matt. 23: 20.

"I DON'T see that it makes any difference; none of the boys who have joined the church seem any better for it. They're just like they used to be." Robert Owen said this in answer to a teacher in the college, who was urging him to seek the salvation of his soul. Several of the boys in the same class with Owen, had been attending the meetings held in the town by a noted evangelist, and had made a profession of faith. Mr. Prior was anxious about Owen, and was having a quiet talk with him in his own room.

"If you could look into their hearts," Mr. Prior said, "you would see a great difference. When the Holy Spirit takes possession of a soul, whether it is that of a man or a boy, the change is so great that it is called, being born again. I wish you would pray for that change, Owen. It would be the making of you. Think what an awful thing it would be to be lost forever."

"Oh, yes, the minister at home used to try to scare me that way. I am not afraid. I know a man out in our town, who talked that all over with me. He says the boys who join the church are just as likely to be lost as anybody else. What you have to do, is to do right and then you won't be lost. That is what he told me, and I believe he is right."

"Well, do you always do right?"

"I try to."

"And do you succeed? I think I remember your being punished not very long ago, when you were clearly in the wrong."

"Oh, well, everybody does wrong sometimes. Those boys who have joined the church do wrong, too. Why, only yesterday, Evans—"

"Never mind others just now, Owen. Let us look at home. Why do you do wrong, ever?"

"I cannot help it. I mean to do right and that is a good deal. Sometimes you get provoked and sometimes you are off your guard. It is not often."

"That is to say you cannot do what you wish to do. It is a common difficulty. Everybody has to face it sooner or later. And there is not only the humiliation of failure, but there is the sense of wrong, the feeling that you might have done right if you had chosen; but you did wrong wilfully. Is it not so? Don't you feel to despise yourself when you have not come up to your own ideal?"

"Yes, that is so. But I shall get stronger. I am better now than I used to be."

"What is your standard, Owen?"

"Oh, to be fair and square, never to be mean, or tell a lie, or do anybody an injury."

"Well that is not a very high standard, though it seems to be higher than you can realize. Christ's ideal was a good deal higher than that. He said, for instance, we should love our enemies. Ever try to do that, Owen? Come, I know you have done as much fighting as any boy in the school—a little more than most. How do you feel to the boys who beat you?"

"Not very good. I don't love them; that's a fact."

"Then you see Christ's standard is a long way above the one you have set for yourself. Suppose you admit that we ought to attain it?"

"Yes; but it's awfully hard. It goes against the grain."

"You are right; and it is the grain that is the difficulty. Our nature is wrong and we are continually falling into wrong-doing, though I, and others of us, want to do right all the time. Think it over Robert, my boy. Solve the problem for me: How to do right when we are being drawn into wrong-doing continually."

The friendly teacher left the boy at this point, believing that the seed sown would bear fruit. A few days afterward he saw him again. It was a holiday, and the boy was going fishing. Mr. Moriah walked with him and sat beside him on the river bank. "Well, how are you getting on now?" he asked, "still trying to follow your friend's advice and do right?"

"Yes; it's the only thing to do; but it's hard. I don't succeed."

"And you never will, my boy; you are beginning at the wrong end. You have to get your heart right first. The conduct will come right then. If you feel right you will do right. Now, you are in earnest, as I think you are, try at way. Go to God and ask him to give you a new heart. He will if you ask him and you will be surprised to find how much easier your work will be. It is the only way to succeed."

"Is that what you call conversion?"

"That is it. When that change comes, in answer to prayer, and through trusting in Christ, you may hope to do whatsoever things Christ commanded, and that is the highest ideal we can conceive of."

SELF-CONSCIOUSNESS.

S. LESSON FOR DEC. 28, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
REV. 1:8-20; GOLDEN TEXT, MATT. 28:20.*

The Effect of Adam's Fall—Consciousness of God Exchanged for Self-Consciousness—The Revelation to Abraham—John's Consciousness of Being in the Spirit—His Declaration of Brotherhood—His Vision of His Lord—The Anointed Senses—The Effect of the Vision—What Consciousness of God's Presence Produces.

THE presence of God! In the day that Adam fell, he surely died—his body and his soul lived on, but the Spirit which recognized the presence of his God, "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible" (1. Pet. 3:4) died, and Adam became self-conscious instead of conscious of his God! The old oneness of interest, when God brought all the living creatures to Adam, that he might name them, was at an end; and a being intensely, painfully conscious of himself shrunk away from the voice of God among the trees of the garden! Self-life had developed with sin, and Adam was afraid of the presence of God! Self-consciousness blinds us to the presence of God; but nothing so delivers from self-consciousness as the known presence of God.

In the lives of an Enoch and a Noah, the reality of the presence of God became known again, they "walked with God." But in the life of Abraham we have a very practical illustration of the life to which God calls us in his very presence while we are here on earth. Abraham had been an idolater. (Josh. 24:2.) God revealed himself to him, and then called him to act as one to whom the presence of God was real, not a mere doctrine or article of faith. He must come out from country, kindred, and father's house, to a land which his unseen God would show him. Self-consciousness would have said, "I cannot act in a way which no one will understand; what will people say of me? How can I maintain my character as a man of common sense and business ability? How can I justify such a want of respect to the opinions of my relations?" God was real to Abraham, his spirit was made alive, the presence of God was to him more overpoweringly real than all these human and earthly considerations; and so he proved his faith in God by Acting Upon His Direction, leaving the consequences to him. By faith "he went out" from Ur of the Chaldees, "by faith he sojourned in the land of promise." Even when it came to the point of offering up his son Isaac, of whom God had said, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called," Abraham was so sure that God could not fail him, that he "rose up early in the morning" to obey this inexplicable command, "accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead." If Abraham had yielded to self-consciousness, he could never have stood such a test. If he had looked at his own faith, he would never have found it equal to the task, if he had weighed his love for God against his love for Isaac, he would never have undertaken the journey to Mt. Moriah. If he had fallen back on his reason, and argued, "I am mistaken; it is a false impression, God never could have said such a thing," Abraham would have failed; but the presence of his God was so real to him that it silenced argument, and stilled all self-considerations. Abraham "believed God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were." (Rom. 4:17.) He never considered what he was or was not. He "considered not his own body." (Rom. 4:19.) He was given over to God, that was enough; his work was to consider who God was, "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek him." (Heb. 11:5.)

How do we come to God in our prayers? Is it with an attempt to feel that God is there? It is the Holy Spirit who makes us Conscious of God.

No man can make himself feel the presence of God. We must "believe that he is," and then act upon that faith, putting off the shoes from off our feet, we must respect the presence of our God. A man who is conscious of the presence of God, to whom his presence is a reality, cannot just kneel down and utter a few words of prayer, and then get up and turn instantly to something else. He will wait upon the Lord to see if he has something to say to him. One who is conscious of God's presence in the Word, will pause in reading, that he who wrote may speak his words in living light into his soul.

The aged apostle John was in his presence. In the midst of his letter written to the Churches, from his Lord, he had just broken off to sing the wondrous song, "Unto him that loveth us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Into a spirit thus absorbed by him, Christ comes abruptly, and declares himself, "I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, he which is, and which was, and which cometh, the Almighty."

John so lived in

that this was no interruption to him, just as his own song of praise made no break in his letter. The presence, the words of his Master could not interrupt him, he was always at his disposal. Oh, how real this letter must have been to its first readers when they saw from time to time the real sender breaking in with a direct word in this way! "The High and lofty One which inhabiteth eternity" covers all time, I am, I was, I come. In such a presence John speaks of himself, "I, John, your brother." All his past experience of his Lord gives him no higher place, he recognizes every child of God as his brother. Any little differences of progress, of experience, of usefulness, of position, where are they? In the presence of God, they sink into nothingness.

"And in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ," John was a prisoner, but looking above the earthly authority which had laid violent hands on him to the King of kings and Lord of lords who had permitted it, he saw no other authority, recognized no other kingdom, dealt with no other king. But in this kingdom, one characteristic was, above all, necessary—

Paul teaches us to glory in tribulation because it "worketh patience." (Rom. 5:3.) James to "count it all joy" when we fall into divers temptations, knowing that the trying of our faith worketh patience (James 1:2, 3), and he tells us that patience must have her perfect work, "that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." There is no real patience where Christ is not recognized as King. When we consider what we are, what is due to us from others and how far we are of importance to the world or to the Church—the self-consciousness which makes such thoughts possible, brings us into another kingdom—that of self—and impatience and unbelief revive in such an atmosphere. John saw all things subject to him in whose presence he stood and lived, and what his Lord could permit, John could permit, too; as long as his Lord could wait, his disciple could wait, too, even though for his Master's coming.

"I... was in the isle that is called Patmos for the Word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." He does not so much as mention that he was a prisoner, it mattered so little: bound or free, he was there as God's instrument. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet." John's were anointed ears. He had yielded himself to his God as one "alive from the dead," and his "members as instruments of righteousness unto God." By force of habit, heavenly sounds were more distinct to him, and more familiar than the sounds of earth; and the voice which, to one who did not know the presence of God, would have been inaudible, was to John as "a great trumpet." "And I turned to see the Voice." Eye and ear were alike anointed, alike at the disposal of his Lord. "And having turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks, and in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the Son of Man." Christ and his Church filled the vision of this man who lived in the presence of his Lord.

John saw his Lord, no longer as the young man, crucified at the age of thirty-three; it was "the Ancient of Days," with hair as "white as wool," but his Lord, the same Jesus: "His eyes as a flame of fire." John could understand now how he could answer the thoughts of the reasoning Pharisees, and how from the mountain side he could see his disciples in the midst of the lake of Tiberias, "toiling in rowing." Nothing could be hidden from those eyes, and nothing is hidden now.

"And he had in his right hand seven stars, and out of his mouth proceeded a sharp two-edged sword, and his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength." To the eyes of a man in the immediate presence of God, the stars, "the angels [or elders] of the seven churches" (ver. 20) were all in the right hand of Jesus, held, kept, used by him to whom all power belongs. Was John puffed up by this revelation of Christ? No; he

"Fell at His Feet as Dead,"

"There shall no man see me and live;" the flesh, the human cannot stand before God, his glory withers self-consciousness. Only the dead, the crucified with Christ, the nothing in themselves, can exist in the presence of God. "And he laid his hand upon me, saying, fear not; I am the first and the last, and the Living One; and I was dead, and, behold, I am alive for evermore." (R. V.) The same presence which slays self-consciousness, dwells within us as the Living One, with us always, "even unto the end of the world." It is the presence of God and no power or experience of ours which is able to subdue the power of the enemy in ourselves or others. It was his presence with his people which conquered the enemies in Egypt and in Canaan, and it is only as recognizing and dwelling in his presence, free from the consciousness of self by his greater presence, that we can be ready for his appearing.

RECRUITS FOR THE PULPIT.

IN no profession or occupation has there been so marked a change during the present century as among the clergy. The old custom in New England was for a church to settle a minister for life. He came to it a young man, and he remained with it as he advanced through life to old age, until he died full of years and honors. His growth in experience was considered to increase the value of his services, both as preacher and as counselor, and his grey hairs were accounted a crown of glory.

All this has been changed. Go through New England now, and it is the rare exception to find an old clergyman who has spent his life in the same parish. What is more, it is seldom that one sees in the pulpit an old man. In the cities and large towns especially, the visitor is struck by the unusual proportion of cases in which the preacher is a man under forty, oftentimes apparently a man who has been but a short time out of the theological seminary. "What young men the ministers nowadays are!" one constantly exclaims; and then follows the question: "What becomes of all the old ministers?"

The question is answered in a recent communication, by "A Young Minister," in a religious contemporary of Boston. Quoting the remark of a deacon, that "we want a young man," and that "a man of forty would be of no use in this field—he is too old," the writer shows that this was no isolated case, by adducing the testimony of the manager of the Boston Ministerial Bureau, that "the churches now demand young men," and that "there are comparatively few chances to place ministers who are getting along in years, or even those who are in middle life." He also presents his own experience, which is a striking illustration of the tendency. He is a young man, just out of the theological seminary, and he has had calls from six churches. The reverse side of the picture is presented to us in the case of a minister about fifty years old, active and vigorous, a good preacher, in the full maturity of all his powers, who for a year and a half has been vainly seeking a church large enough to pay him a salary that will support his family—the sole trouble being that "he has passed the dead-line of forty."

It is not so in other professions. The young lawyer who averages a dollar a day the first year he hangs out his shingles in a lucky fellow. The young physician is fortunate if he takes in enough the opening year of his practice to pay the cost of keeping his horse. On the other hand, the theologian of average ability can step from the seminary into a church that will pay him from $1,000 to $2,500 for his first year's services. But the lawyer or the physician finds his income swelling with his growing age and widening experience, while the clergyman too often finds himself virtually superannuated before he has reached middle life.

The change in the minister's tenure is accompanied by a falling off in the number of young men who enter the ministry. The percentage of graduates who enter the ministry has been for decades steadily and rapidly falling, not only at Harvard and Yale, but in smaller institutions of a more distinctively religious tone, like Brown, Amherst and Oberlin, at which last the ratio has sunk from two-thirds to below one-third.

Is it strange that such a state of things exists? Is it to be wondered at that college graduates look askance at a profession in which they see members held disqualified for service at an age when they should be just entering upon their prime? And can churches expect to attract young men into the ministry when young men see that a minister of forty is accounted "too old"? These are suggestive questions.

CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

MY pulpit table for the last two Sundays in Brooklyn and New York has been adorned with these queens of the floral dominion. For the past few weeks our public exhibitions have been ablaze with this foreign flower. Even people who had long ago decided that the Chinese must go, have generously decided that this Chinese plant may take possession of our gardens and hothouses. Thousands of citizens have paid for the privilege of looking upon these constellations of floral beauty. To walk among them has seemed like crossing a corner of heaven. We applaud this floral exhibition as indicative of elevated taste. He who in the Book of books compares himself to the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley, no doubt approves of this decoration of our city. There is a possibility that the Rose, which has heretofore been considered the Queen of flowers, may be out-voted by the one thousand varieties of this Mongolian importation. Long live the Chrysanthemum!

Some fear that it will get to be a craze among our people, but there is no danger of that. If it were like wheat, something to eat; or like cotton, something to wear; or like coal, something to burn—it might get to be a matter of wild speculation; but as it is only something to look at, our practical people could not be frenzied with chrysanthemums. Yet it might be well to refer some of our floral enthusiasts to the tulip mania of Holland in the seventeenth century. A lawyer transplanted a tulip from Southern Russia, where it grows without cultivation, to Holland, and after the flower had grown in popularity for about seventy years, suddenly all Holland went into a botanical dementia. All classes of people began to speculate in tulips. Whole estates were invested in them. The Viceroy tulip, the Admiral VanDerey tulip, and the Semper Augustus tulip were the more valuable. Of this last variety one root was sold for $1,840,000. The Government finally passed a law forbidding the wild prices, but not in time to hinder the commercial ruin of all Holland. A sailor in Amsterdam one day picked up from a counter a tulip root; supposing it to be an onion, he ate it, and down his throat went a whole fortune, for which the poor man was seized and tried and imprisoned. The mania was so terrific that fragments of tulip so small that they had no vitality in them were bought and sold. An especial weight called the "perit" was established to settle the value of these infinitesimals. Nine great tulip exchanges were opened, and all the oil and Morus multicalius excitements of our own country put together did not equal that tulip mania which raged for three years.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Thomas Needham is holding meetings at Warren, Pa. A deep interest pervades the town, and many conversions have been reported.

Rev. E. P. Telford's services at Century M. E. Church, Jersey City, have been much blessed. About two hundred persons have made a profession of faith.

The Societies of Christian Endeavor are arranging for the general observance of Feb. 3, 1891, throughout the United States and Canada as Christian Endeavor Day. Mrs. Bayeartz, a converted Jewess, has been doing evangelistic work in San Francisco, speaking nightly to crowded meetings at the First Baptist Church. She is now laboring at Sacramento.

Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York, celebrated the seventieth anniversary of his birth on Dec. 4th. He is still doing as much pastoral work and hard labor as at any time in his life.

Two million dollars have been bequeathed to various colleges in the will of the late Daniel B. Fayerweather, of New York, which was presented for probate last week. Bequests to the amount of $95,000 were also made to the hospitals of the city.

Evangelist Charles Inglis has finished his work at Portland, Me. The large hall in which the services were held was well filled every Sunday. His Bible Meetings were especially well attended. He is now going to England for a visit, but expects to return in time for the summer work.

Dr. C. L. Mann, Chancellor of the University of the Southland, lectured on Dec. 11th in the 44th Street M. E. Church, New York, on an "Inside View of Southern Life." The audience listened to the lecture with deep interest, and, at the close, passed a resolution of approval on his work in Alabama, and commended it to the support of the Northern churches.

A union meeting will be held in New York at four o'clock each afternoon during the Week of Prayer, January 4-11, under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance. Announcements will be made of the church in which it is to be held. As but one meeting is to be held daily, it will not interfere with arrangements that may be made by any churches for the observance of the week.

Rev. Dr. Johnston, of Brownstone, Jamaica, W. I., passed through New York last week, on his way to Africa. He takes with him eight colored students from Jamaica, who are converted men and eager to engage in missionary work. He proposes to place them as volunteer helpers in regularly established mission stations, where they will be trained for independent work and be prepared to penetrate further and establish other stations. Dr. Johnston goes to Africa at his own expense. He is a regular physician with a good practice in Jamaica, and, in addition, does a great deal of preaching at various churches.

Rev. E. W. Oakes has returned from his evangelistic tour, in England. He has visited all the missions established in England and Scotland by Rev. M. Baxter, preaching a short time at each, and has also held conventions at central points for the promotion of holiness and the deepening of religious life. His success has been remarkable and God's blessing has attended his labors. His return has been hastened by an urgent call from his church at Manchester, N. H., the pastorate of which he resigned before going to England. They accepted his resignation with deep reluctance and have pressed their request for his return with an urgency he was unable to resist.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Will the World's Fair Open Sundays?—The Indian Messiah Craze—Aerial Navigation—Parnell's Desperate Fight—Missing Explorers—A Chinese Massacre, etc.

Will the World's Fair be Open Sundays?—This is a question whose agitation by all the Christian bodies in the Union seems imminent. At the recent meeting of the American Sabbath Union in Philadelphia, resolutions were adopted endorsing many petitions for the closing of the Fair on the Sabbath. Des Moines was selected as the place for the next annual convention of the Union. Colonel Elliott F. Shepard, editor of the New York Mail and Express, was re-elected President. This mark of confidence in his administration was tendered although he announced that he did not wish the office again. Col. Shepard, whose portrait is given above, is now in the prime of a most active and energetic career, and his wealth, social influence and personal activities are all enlisted in the cause of Christianity. He is a native of Jamestown, N. Y., about fifty-six years of age, and represents one of the richest families in America.

Parnell With the Desperation of a Drowning Man, still clings to his leadership of the Irish Parliamentary Party. His persistency has split in twain what was, a month ago, a solid following and practically a political balance of power. Gladstone has thus far made no promises as to the Liberals' Home Rule programme. Meanwhile, there is no apparent possibility of a reconciliation between Parnell and O'Brien, Dillon, Davitt, and the anti-Parnellites who have accepted Justin McCarthy as their temporary leader. Parnell declares that the action of the forty-five members, in leaving the caucus of the Irish Parliamentary Party a week ago, makes reconciliation impossible, and that the next general election must decide whether he is to be sustained in the leadership. This may come in three months. At Dublin he spoke to a vast audience, urging them to stand by him in the fight. The forty-five seceders, who constitute the majority of the Irish Parliamentarians, issued a manifesto a few days ago, pronouncing the cause of Ireland lost if Parnell retained the leadership, and asking the country to decide. A somewhat similar manifesto has been issued by O'Brien and Dillon. One of the incidents of Parnell's Dublin trip was his visit to the office of United Ireland, where with the aid of a crowd of sympathisers, armed with crowbars, and the leader himself having one, he forcibly ousted the anti-Parnellite guard of eight men, expelled the acting editor, Mr. Bodkin, destroyed the articles in type, and seized the office. He then harangued the crowd from one of the office windows, declaring he would submit to no man's dictation, but would fight to the last.

Navigating the Air is To-day as Much of a matter for ridicule and scepticism as was the use of steam a century ago. Yet there are some hopeful, scientific souls who still dream of airships and a few of them have subscribed something less than twenty millions of dollars for the purpose of building a fleet of airships. The Mount Carmel Aerial Navigation Company is the title of the prospective conqueror of the upper element and E. J. Pennington is the inventor of a machine which will start in a few weeks on the first experimental trip from St. Louis to Chicago and thence to New York. The airship is two hundred feet in length and the cabin is of aluminum. Half a dozen of the stockholders will show their confidence in the safety and reliability of the machine by ascending on the trial trip.

Fears are Entertained for the Fate of the Arkell Exploring Party now in Alaska. Over two months have elapsed since they had communication with the outside world from Nushagak, a remote station, which had been reached only after a toilsome and perilous journey of 1,500 miles in birch canoes, and miners' boats up the Yukon River by portages to the Kuskokwim River. At the latter point, the hope of getting transportation on some fishing vessel was disappointed. On this memorable trip the party visited innumerable Eskimo villages, mapped 3,000 miles of practically unknown territory and collected much valuable material. An attempt was to be made to reach Kadiak Island by crossing the Alaska Peninsula before the winter ice was formed, but the result is unknown.

News Comes Simultaneously of the Impending promulgation of the Anti-Jewish law by Russia next month, and of the great meeting in London in behalf of the persecuted Hebrews in the Czar's dominions. The new law forbids the leasing or mortgaging of any real estate to Hebrews, and compels them to sell all such property now held by members of that race. Jewish artisans are deprived of certain rights and kept strictly within fixed residential lines. At the London gathering the Lord Mayor presided and the Duke of Westminster, Lord Ripon and other notabilities spoke. A resolution was adopted petitioning the Czar in behalf of the oppressed race.

Although an Indian War now Seems a Very remote possibility owing to the formidable display of strength made by the War Department, which has inspired a wholesome respect among the dancing Utes and Sioux, there still is much agitation over the red-skin "Messiah" craze. It is now believed that the disaffection has spread to the Canadian Indians and that they will join in the dancing. General Miles will command the troops at Pine Ridge, where everything is quiet and where a number of the Indian leaders in the agitation have been arrested. Meanwhile, the scare has had a lamentable effect on the settlers in many parts of the new Western Country, and they are banding together for defence, as in South Dakota, Oklahoma and elsewhere the Indians are threatening trouble. The Utes who have till now been quiet, have caught the Messiah craze, and are preparing to dance, the settlers near the reservation being equally determined to resent the first attempts at depredations or violence. Johnson Sides, the originator of all this tumult among the red men, and who is said to have been put forward by the trouble-making chiefs as either the Messiah or his forerunner, is a mild-looking, peacefully-disposed Indian of about 35 years of age. He was partly educated at one of the missions. His portrait, (in this column) shows a rather intelligent, somewhat heavy face, and the expression of anything but a "bad Indian." Sides, who claims to have been translated to heaven in a trance, has been merely a tool in the hands of cunning leaders, and through his visions, and his enthusiasm in telling of them, has been made the innocent medium of spreading an excitement which came very near embroiling the country in an Indian war.

Heathen Fanaticism in China has Resulted in another frightful massacre. According to the cable, the natives of Long Ting Tsin, in Chung, belonging the Lee Huy Ses Society, became incensed against the native Christians of the place, doubtless being instigated by the priests. They inquired of their "gods" if it would be safe to plunder the Christians, and the pagan deities, by the crafty lips of the priests, gave approval of the plan. Accordingly a raid was made which resulted in the capture of considerable plunder. Unsatisfied, the raiders again attacked the Christians in overwhelming numbers and this time left over twenty dead bodies as evidences of their hatred of the "new religion," and its devoted martyrs. An attack was afterward made on the Christians of another neighboring village, but the alarm had been given and the intended victims all escaped, with the exception of a single unfortunate, who fell beneath the swords and knives of his brutal assailants. China claims to be among the oldest of civilized nations; yet here is a record which even the savages of Central Africa could hardly parallel for bloodthirstiness and fanaticism.

One of the Few Men Whom Professor Koch has fully entrusted with the secret of his wonderful lymph preparation is Professor Von Bergmann, whose portrait is given in this column. Since the beginning of these remarkable experiments Professor Bergmann has been the constant associate and helper of the great investigator at the hospital clinics and in the quiet study which the Professor calls his "workshop." He has had the duty assigned him of sending the lymph abroad and some of the packages have already been received and their contents used on consumptive patients in this country, although it is impossible as yet to tell the result. Analysts everywhere are striving to ascertain the ingredients of the lymph. In Paris, it is confidently asserted that it has been successfully analyzed and found to contain the ptomaines of tubercular bacilli (a poison as virulent as the venom of a serpent,) cyanure of gold and glycerine. Prof. Koch, finding his own time almost wholly required in experiments, has entrusted to Professor Bergmann with Drs. Levy and Cornet as assistants, the army and pauper hospital wards where patients are being inoculated in large numbers.

Something Like Order has at Last been evolved from the somewhat chaotic condition of the World's Fair Managers' programme. Commissioner John Boyd Thatcher states that the two Boards are now working harmoniously. It has been settled that the art department, music hall, and spectacular features will go on the Lake front, and the Government, mechanical, horticultural, and live-stock exhibits in Jackson Park. The competitive system of premiums will be abolished in all except the live-stock department where $250,000 in premiums will be awarded. Parchment certificates accompanied by bronze medals will take the place of premiums elsewhere, $25,000 to $50,000 being appropriated for the medals.

The Body of General Grant will Remain in its present sepulchre at Riverside Park, New York, the House of Representatives having rejected the resolution introduced by Congressman Plumb, of Texas, to remove the tomb to Arlington Cemetery. The concluding speeches which apparently decided the fate of the resolution, claimed that the General had made New York his home, had meant to live and die there and that it would be as much a desecration to remove his bones now as it would be to remove those of Washington from Mount Vernon or Jackson from "the Hermitage."

A Novel Method of Abolishing Titles has been suggested by a member of the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Moreau. He has introduced a bill taxing very heavily titles of every sort. A Baron must pay 5,000 francs a year for the privilege of so signing himself; a Viscount, 10,000; a Count, 20,000; a Prince, 100,000, and any title with the prefix "Your Highness" carries with it a prohibitory tax of 200,000 francs. The scheme is amusing the French capital, but few people there seem to take it seriously.

"The Christian Herald" Binder.—Numerous Applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar.

FEVER AND ITS CURE.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The Fever in Peter's House—The Lord's Coming—The Healing—I. Spiritual Fevers very Common—Begin with Restlessness—Sometimes Intermittent—Cause Thirst—The Fatal Brain Fever—II. Arise from Many Causes—From Dwelling in the Lowlands—From Stagnation—From Poor Diet—III. Mischievous in any Form—Bring Pain—Spoil the Beauty—IV. One Who Can Cure Them.

"And he arose out of the synagogue, and entered into Simon's house. And Simon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; and they besought him for her. And he stood over her, and rebuked the fever; and it left her; and immediately she arose and ministered unto them."—Luke 4: 38, 39.

PETER was of Bethsaida; but yet he had a house at Capernaum. Is it not highly probable that he had moved there to be near our Lord's headquarters, to hear everything that he said, to see all his miracles, and to yield him constant attendance and service? I think it was so. In his house, Simon willingly entertained his wife's mother, which is presumptive evidence that he was a good man, willing out of love to run risk of discomfort. We have evidence that his wife's mother was a good woman; for the moment that she was healed, she arose and ministered unto them; whereas, in too many cases, an invalid and aged person would demand to be waited upon. She was a blessing to any house, for she evidently lent all the strength she had to the work of the family. I know just such women, whose very life is to minister to others. Happy Peter to have such a mother-in-law! Happy mother-in-law to have such a son!

Good as the tenants were, sickness came to the house. But then, it so happened—and it so happens always—that just

When the Trial Came, Jesus came, too. As our tribulations abound, so do our consolations. I have often noticed that when we are exceeding glad, some ill news will hurry up to calm our excitement. On the other hand, when we are exceeding sorrowful, the Lord, by his Holy Spirit, causes a sense of peace and rest to steal over us, and sustain us. How often have I found the divine presence more consciously revealed, and more sweetly sustaining in the hour of trouble than at any other season! I would not invite the fever to my house; but if Jesus would come with it, I would not be alarmed at its approach. If we do see our Lord riding on the pale horse, we will welcome the horse for the sake of its rider. Come, Lord Jesus, come how thou wilt; but suffer not the trial to come alone!

When Jesus came, they told him of her. Make a practice of telling the Lord about all your family concerns. Bring sicknesses and other troubles to your best friend. Do it at family prayer, but do it also at your bedside alone. If Jesus has come to stay with you, he will not hold himself aloof from your anxieties. He comes with his great sympathetic heart to be afflicted in your afflictions. So Peter and the rest told Jesus of the good woman who was bedridden with fever, and at once the Lord Jesus went into the room, and brought his divine power to bear upon the disease, that she might be at once restored. He stood over her; he rebuked the fever; he took her by the hand and lifted her up, and in a moment the fever was gone, and she was not only well, but strong.

I. Let me, first, remind you, that Spiritual Fevers are Common. A fever begins with a kind of restlessness. The patient cannot be quiet, nor be at ease in any position. He is not pleased with anything for more than a moment. He cannot help it; he is tossed to and fro, and is like the troubled sea. He suspects everybody, and has confidence in nothing. Are there not many who are in that condition with regard to spiritual things? Their religion is a question, rather than a doctrine—an experiment and not an experience.

This restlessness affects them with regard to temporal things, too; they are always anxious, doubtful, timorous. There is that excellent woman, Martha. She is here to-night, but she has felt three or four times in her pocket for her keys. She is half afraid that an accident will happen to the baby before she gets back. She is anxious about everything she can think of, and anxious about some things she has not thought of. Evidently she has

The Domestic Fever upon her, and rest is completely out of the question. She must worry and fidget: there is no consoling her. I know what it is as a minister to feel very feverish about the characters and proceedings of the members of the church. I have been told that farmers are very liable to the weather-fever. It is either too wet or too dry. There may be good times for the root-crops; but then, it is bad for the corn. Merchants have the speculative fever, and workmen the strike fever. Some of you tradesfolk are wonderfully feverish in reference to your shop and your stock-taking. Will you, after all, have a good season, and make a fair profit? When a man falls into that state, although we do not call in a doctor, there is great need to call in the heavenly Physician.

The influence of fever is seen in other ways. It is intermittent, and makes the patient change from hot to cold. Feverish persons love a religion of excitement. They are eager and impatient, omit repentance, and leap into a false security. Their zeal is not according to knowledge; and so it is fierce as the blaze of thorns under a pot, and it dies out as soon. This fever heat soon turns to a chill; and they shiver with dislike of the very thing they cried up so loudly. They are

As Cold as They Were Hot; and they turn to be as hot as they were cold. A strange fever is upon them, and you know not where to find them. The steady warmth of vital principle, intelligent faith, true love to Christ, and zeal for the conversion of souls, has little in common with the fever of fanaticism. May God grant that we may always have the warmth of healthy life, but may we be saved from being delirious one day and lethargic the next! Religious inflammation is the dangerous counterfeit of holy zeal. Be as hot as you will; but do not turn cold directly, or else we shall tremble for you.

A worse kind of fever, perhaps, is that which shows itself in thirst of different kinds. Some suffer from the yellow fever of avarice: they thirst for gold-water, and the more they drink the more the thirst consumes them. They rise up early, they sit up late, they eat the bread of carefulness, and all they long for is to gain and hoard. They are all hack and hurry, toil and turmoil, woe and worry. The deadly yellow fever is upon them—they must lay up much goods for many years, and add field to field till they are left alone in the earth. God save his people from even a touch of this fever!

Alas, alas! I have to mention one other fever which is a kind of gastric fever,

A Fever of the Stomach! It always comes to men who have degraded themselves below the brutes by intoxication. When they seek to abstain and quit the cup, a drink-fever hinders them. Some imagine that it is an easy thing to escape from drunkenness; but it is not so. Those who are now true children of God have given us an awful description of the hankering which came upon them months after they had given up the drink. Often it seemed to them nothing but a miracle that they kept clear of the temptation: they felt as if they must drink or die. O dear friends, have great pity upon the drunkard in his struggle to escape.

Yet one more fever I would mention. There is one which I may call brain-fever—a very common disease nowadays. Persons cannot be satisfied with the old doctrines of the Gospel; they must have something new. They do not know that in theology nothing new is true, and nothing true is new. God has given us a faith which he once for all delivered unto the saints, with no intent that it should ever be changed. Do you think that revelation is imperfect, and that we are to improve upon it? After all, then, it is not God's revelation that we are to believe but our own deductions therefrom, and our own improvements thereupon. God forbid that we should fall under such a delusion! If this fever is upon any one of you, may the cooling hand of the Holy Spirit, and the sobering influence of a divine experience, bring you back to spiritual and mental health again. These fevers are as common as they are fatal. If you, dear hearer, have not suffered from them, many others have done so, and we are anxious for their cure; therefore, we would bring them to Jesus, who can rebuke the fever, and heal them.

II. Secondly, these fevers

Arise From Many Causes.

Peter's wife's mother may have been smitten with fever through the undrained and boggy spots around the Sea of Galilee, especially where the Jordan makes a marsh. She dwelt in a low spot, where the air was full of malaria, and the fever pounced upon her. Ah, Christian people! if you live below your privileges, if you live in the marshland of worldliness, if prayer is neglected, if the Bible is not read, if the great truths of the Gospel do not fill your meditations, if you sojourn much among ungodly folk, and make them your companions, you are living in a low situation, where you will get one or other of these fevers before long. If you climb the mountains of confidence in God, and dwell near to God, and rest your souls upon him, the fever will soon vanish; but if you continue in the hollows of unbelief, and the damp places of worldliness, you will grow more and more anxious and restless, and will thirst for evil things.

A second great cause of spiritual fever is allowing things to stagnate. The moment the sanitary authorities cut drains, and let the waters run out of the land, and carry away the filth, the fever begins to abate. Stagnant water breeds miasma, and fever is sure to come. When the waters are no longer putrid, but have free course, then is taken away. Many people get into a feverish state through having everything stagnant! You do not teach in the Sunday School: your teaching power is stagnant. You never go out to the village station to preach: your talking power is stagnant. You have nobody to pray for: your intercessory power is stagnant. Everything about you is still and stale. You have nothing to live for, nothing to do; and therefore your whole being is shut up within itself, and this breeds mischief. The Lord help you to cut a good wide drain, and let your life run out to some useful purpose, instead of hoarding it up by selfishness. Spiritual fever soon disappears before holy, unselfish activity.

But, worst of all, fever is often born of filth. I suppose that even excessive heat would not produce it, if it were not for decaying matter which, in rotting, gives out evil vapors and deadly gases. There is nothing more putrid in the natural world than sin is in the moral world. I charge you, children of God, be clean in yourselves and your surroundings. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." It is hard to in these days; but yet we must aim at it. Our public walls disgust us with indecencies of the most staring kind; they make us blush for the times. We can, however, keep ourselves from the resorts of the frivolous, the vicious, and the drunken; and I beseech you, as you love the Lord, and as you desire to be healthy in his sight, stand not in the way of sinners, nor sit in the seat of the scorners. Run not with the multitude to do evil. Come ye out from among them: be ye separate: touch not the unclean thing, for then God will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be his sons and daughters. The corruption which reeks around us has the dread tendency to breed fevers in our minds of the most perilous kind; we must, therefore, use our utmost endeavors to keep ourselves disinfected by the grace of God.

Not to leave out any one thing which may instruct us, I would remind you that fevers are often caused by poor diet. Persons have not enough to eat, and the fever germs fructify in their weakness. With many Christians the meal seems to be one spiritual meal a week. Every morning is the occasion for baiting the religious horse. Your very respectable Christian person goes out to worship on Sunday morning; but at no other time. What does he do on Sunday afternoon? This deponent sayeth nought. What does he do on Sunday evening? He is at home taking his ease. At a prayer-meeting, some time ago, one brother prayed that the Lord would bless those who were at home "on days of sickness and on sofas of well-ness." The last words were unexpected, but very edifying. Certain of our friends practice the art of tarrying at home; but I fear they do not provide the spoil. They

Live on One Meal a Week.

Would any of you, who are doing this, oblige me with a trial of this regimen in reference to your bodies? Will you only eat on a Sunday morning? You shall take what you please at that one meal, and consume as much as you wish of it; but you must have only that one meal till next week. Do you decline the experiment? I think you are wise. I should not expect to see you here often to report your experience. I feel sure you would break through the regulation before it had reached its full result. Therefore, I pray you, do not carry out the experiment of spiritual starvation, lest you die the operation. This neglect of heavenly food brings many Christians into so low a state that spiritual fever readily fastens upon them.

III. Thirdly, and as briefly as I can, this fever, in any of its forms,

Is Mischievous.

What does it do? Well, fever puts you altogether out of order. You cannot precisely say where a fever begins or ends, or in what organ it operates most powerfully; for it puts the whole system out of gear. Nothing is right. You feel as if you could not sit, or lie, or be quiet in any position. You cannot do anything, and yet you must be doing. Now, when a soul gets into the fever of unbelief, and fear, and anxiety, the system is in general disorder. The prayer is fevered; the song languishes; the patience fails; the service drags. The mind is like a harp whose strings are out of tune. It is a mischievous thing, this fever—mischievous to every faculty. And then it brings pain and misery. In the commencement of a fever, pain is usually felt in the joints and other parts of the body. If I am fearful and anxious, I am in mental pain. If I am doubting and dreading, I am in pain. If I am fretful, irritable, petulant, murmuring, I must have pain; and hence it is an evil thing to be overtaken by a spiritual fever.

Mental fever takes away his beauty from the Christian. A man who has a fever has his features pinched and drawn. A practised doctor can tell when a patient has the fever by the very look of his face. Looking at his eyes, and other features, he says, "This man has a typhoid fever upon him. I am sure of it." Are there not some Christians who do not look as they used to look?

They are Ill-humored, or timid, or fretful, or hasty, and all through the inward fever. Their voice has lost the joyful note it used to have, and their whole deportment is dreary. The hallelujahs have gone; the hosannahs have died out. The Lord would have his people beautiful and glad. He made them that they might show forth his praise. It is no small evil when the heat of spiritual fever dries up the moisture of our graces, and turns comeliness into corruption. If by God's grace we are delivered from this fever, it may leave behind it sad remains. Any doctor will tell you that fevers are not only to be dreaded for what they are, but for what they leave behind them. When a man is cured of fever, he may yet be injured for the rest of his life; and if you and I do not keep quiet before God, and calm and happy, but begin to get anxious, and wilful, and avaricious, and ambitious, we may hurt ourselves seriously for all time; and, it may be, even on our death-bed we shall look back with sorrow to that day of unbelief when we grieved the Lord and lost his presence. The Lord keep us from these fevers in every degree!

I must also remind you of one thing more, beloved: this disease, as I have said, is catching. If some of you could fret, and trouble, and worry yourselves, and did not at the same time injure others, it might not so much matter; but the sad fact is, there are some Christians who drag others down into their own wretchedness. You spoil the joys of the saints. They are willing to comfort you, but you ought not to be so ready to cause them disquietude. Some of you are enough to give the fever of despondency to a whole parish. God's ministers are willing to comfort you; but they ought not to be called upon to spend so much time in entering into your case. I am content to be a nurse, but I had rather be winning souls.

IV. Lastly, there is

One Who Can Cure the Fever.

I am afraid that I have given rather a sad description, and I am sorry that some of you have been obliged to say, "However sad, it is true of us." But observe, dear friends, the cure, which is not wrought by medicine, or surgery, or any profound system of the doctors. The cure lies here. The poor patient lies flat in her bed. We read, "She was laid, and sick of a fever." She could not therefore sit up, much less rise from the bed. When she opened her eyes, and looked up, she saw the Lord Jesus Christ standing over her. O fevered soul! open thine eyes to-night, and see Jesus standing over thee. With tender love and infinite compassion he looks down upon thee; he shields thee, thinks of thee, and watches over thee for good. He will help thee; therefore, fear not. Over thee to-night he broods, as doth an eagle over its young. Jehovah-Jesus bows over thee with fullness of love and power. In thy present trouble, fear, and depression of spirit, Jesus stands over thee, and his eye and his heart are upon thee.

We read that, when our Lord had touched her, he rebuked the fever. Your feverishness deserves his rebuke.

Oh, That He would Bid it Begone!

Oh, that he would say over you to-night, "Begone unbelief! Begone anxiety! Begone fretfulness! Begone doubt and fear!" The winds and the waves heard his rebuke, and from their noise and clamor they hushed themselves to a great calm. Oh, that Jesus would come now, and speak to your feverishness, and you shall be as happy as the birds of paradise.

The next thing Jesus did was to raise her up. You must have felt, when lying very ill, as if you were buried in the bed. So the Saviour gave his hand to her, and he lifted her up. She did not think that she could rise, but with his aid she sat up. Then he gave her an instant cure, and at the same time renewed her strength. No trace of fever remained. She was perfectly well. Her instinct, as a matronly woman and head of the household, was to rise at once to prepare a meal for her Benefactor and his disciples. Oh, that you doubting ones, you fevered ones, might at once be cured and lifted up, so that you would immediately set about serving the Lord, and ministering to those around you. Come let us be as happy as ever we can be, and as useful as it lies in our power to be, and may the fever never visit any one again! On the contrary, as you go home take with you a sense of spiritual health; and when you get home, say at once, "I must minister unto Jesus." God bless you, for the Saviour's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

An Inventor's Birth.*

JOHN Ericsson was born at the opening of this century of mechanical achievement, on July 31, 1803. He was a native of Vermland, a division of Swedish territory, nearly equivalent in size to British Wales or the American State of New Jersey. Vermland is one of the seven "lans," into which Central Sweden is divided, and follows the plan of Stockholm in the order of importance. On its easterly boundary lies the mining district of Nordmark, and here, at the time of John's birth, resided his father, Olof Ericsson, Inspector of mines at Langbanshyttan. As far back, certainly as the seventeenth century, John Ericsson's ancestors were miners in the district where he was born. Sir John Sinclair, who visited Sweden shortly before John's birth, describes this class of Swedes as tall, robust, active and good-looking; loyal to the death. Nils Ericsson, born in 1747, advanced the family one step beyond their ancestral employment as laborers in the Nordmark mines. He was a mining proprietor and accumulated some property. This property was transmitted to his son Olof, the father of John, but Olof's inability to keep it returned the family to its original condition of poverty; so that among John's earliest recollections was the appearance of the sheriff selling the family furniture to satisfy the demands of importunate creditors.

The Boy Inventor.

While only a boy, the future engineer astonished the local gossips with a saw-mill, pumping-engine and a set of drawing instruments which he had made "all out of his own head." Certainly, he had no other tools than a gimlet and a jack-knife. The saw-mill and pump were not childish attempts at imitation; they were practical working models, needing only to be repeated on a larger scale to be useful machines. The boy was then only nine years old, and we may imagine the delight which transported the youthful inventor when he saw the water actually turning the wheel he had attached to this mill and setting its miniature machinery in motion. Half a century later, when John Ericsson was asked to prepare a list of his most noteworthy mechanical achievements, the construction of this saw-mill headed the list of inventions, the pumping-engine and the drawing instruments coming next. The mill was neat and tasteful in design and in every way a most remarkable piece of work for one so young. In a square wooden frame was set a watch-spring, transformed into a saw by the aid of a file borrowed from a neighboring blacksmith. This saw was moved by a crank cast from a broken tin spoon. The rest of the machinery was of wood, and was complete—the bed carrying the log and moved by a cord wound on a drum; the ratchet-wheel and lever to turn the drum; the crank-shaft and the handle for turning it. Encouraged by the success of the venture, the next year this lad of ten undertook to design a pump for clearing the mines of water. The motive power was to be obtained by the use of a windmill. Such a contrivance the youthful inventor had never seen, yet he succeeded in drawing designs for his mill after the most approved fashion of skilled engineers, by following a verbal description given by his father of a mill he had just visited. But alas! he could conceive of no way of adjusting it to the changes of the wind. Again the father visited the mill and, in describing it, referred to a "ball-and-socket joint." The boy seized the idea at once, and with his pencil joined the connecting-rod to the pump-lever with a ball-and-socket joint.

Paddle Against Propeller.

scene Mr. Sargent says: "The Battery and the piers were thronged with an expectant multitude. At her appointed time the Great Western came plowing her way down the East River, under circumstances which manifested more than ordinary effort. She was enveloped in clouds of steam, and of dense black smoke; her paddle wheels were revolving with more than usual velocity, leaving a white wake behind. As she passed the Battery she was greeted with hearty cheers, and a fair field with no favor was all that she seemed to challenge, and the least that all were willing to allow her.

A fine model of a ship, frigate-like, appeared gliding gracefully down the North River, against the tide, without a breath of smoke or steam to obscure her path, with no paddle-wheels or smoke-pipe visible, propelled by a noiseless and unseen agency, without a rag of canvas on her lithe and beautiful spars, but at a speed which soon convinced the assembled thousands that she would successfully dispute the palm with the gallant vessel, celebrated throughout the world, and everywhere admitted to be the queen of the seas. Such is the march of improvement in the arts. The new-comer was the United States war-steamer Princeton. The agent by which she was moved was Ericsson's propeller. She soon reached and passed the Great Western, went round her and passed her a second time before they had reached their point of separation. In a moment, men began to speak lightly of their hitherto favorite paddle wheel, and the propeller that they shrugged their shoulders at, and amused themselves with for some years of doubtful experiment, rose into altogether unexpected favor."

Of the number of steamers built by Ericsson, the Princeton was the only one built under his superintendence. He was extremely particular about the quality both of material and workmanship, and his thoroughness of inspection is shown by a story told of him. On one occasion during the construction of an engine at Delamater's, a certain casting appeared to him doubtful as to soundness and he ordered it broken up. Suspecting that the casting might be made to do duty in some way, he insisted on having it broken on the spot. The workmen tried to break it up with their sledges, but failing, said, "We will put it under the drop by-and-by." His quick temper rose at this and, snatching the sledge from the nearest man, he whirled it like a meteor before the eyes of the astonished spectators and with one blow drove its head through the shell of the dubious casting, making it a hopeless wreck.

MISSIONARY LIFE IN AFRICA.

TWO interesting features of missionary work are illustrated on this page. The picture on the left is of Cecil Majaliwa, a colored man with his family, who is a successful missionary at Chilangali, near Zanzibar. Twenty years ago he was stolen from his native village in the interior and carried off for a slave. With a number of other boys he was taken to the coast and shipped on board a slave-dhow for the Island of Pemba. It was intended to make them work on the plantations there. The dhow was, however, driven out of her course. She was sighted by a British cruiser, pursued and captured. The slaves on board were liberated and were distributed among the mission stations to be educated. Cecil Majaliwa proved a most intelligent boy. He learned quickly and gave evidence that Christian influence had not affected his mind only, but had touched his heart. Having expressed an earnest desire to become a missionary he was sent to England, where he studied at St. Augustine's College, Canterbury. His conduct and progress there were remarkable. He was ordained deacon in 1885, and after completing his course of training he returned to Africa. The station at Chilangali is now in his sole charge, and the work is prospering in his hands.

The picture on the right is of a mission school at Mbweni. It belongs to the Universities Mission which grew out of Mr. Moody's last visit to England. It is one of the most extensive and hopeful missionary enterprises in Eastern Africa. It comprises a home for eighty girls, a separate institute in which twenty girls are receiving an industrial training, and a day-school for girls in which some twenty or thirty pupils are in regular attendance. Close at hand is a village of three hundred released slaves who are being trained in the arts of civilization, cultivating the land, working in blacksmith's shops, in a limekiln, and in other enterprises. They have a church in which there are regular services, schools, etc. The lady in charge of the girls' schools is Mrs. Halliday, who commenced work in that region in 1879. Her name was then Miss Bashford—a name which her eleven years of labor have made famous in missionary records, and beloved by the women of this section of Africa, many of whom, thanks to God's blessing on her labors, are now living civilized Christian lives.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.
BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

THE young carpenter felt all the better and all the brighter for this pleasant ending to his evening walk; but it must not be imagined that he did not revert in the course of his homeward walk to the subject that was just now giving him such distress.

George had witnessed the self-same suspicious meetings between Nora and the young squire which had caused Richard Mansford such distress; and he had come to the conclusion that matters had gone wrong to a very dangerous degree when the handsome girl could meet young Towneley at such times and in such places as demonstrated most clearly that clandestine methods of meeting were preferred.

It was with much heaviness of the heart, and with a cloud upon his brow that the young carpenter went about his daily duties. His usually bright and cheery temperament having been quite a matter of remark by all and sundry—the change that had come over him was quite as general a subject of local comment.

One day, George was busily engaged in the carpenter's shop, shaping and smoothing a new shaft for somebody's crippled cart. There was no customary song or merry whistle issuing from his parted lips. His face could scarcely have worn a more dolorous look if he had really been making a coffin for some of his kith and kin.

Nora Mansford entered the shop, and bade the wheelwright a kindly "Good morning." She looked sadly worn and wan, and George's heart was full of sorrow to see the change.

"Good morning, Miss Nora," said he, his heart leaping to his lips at the sight of her, so as almost to tie his tongue. "It doesn't seem, though, to be a particularly good morning to you, judging by the color of your cheeks and the tone of your voice. Can I do anything for you to make it better?"

"Yes, you can, George Appleton," said Nora, with a little laugh, that had no ring in it. "You can mend the color of your own face, and alter the tone of your own voice, for they need brightening quite as much as mine do."

George laid down the tool which he had been using, looked straight at the girl out of his two honest eyes, and said, speaking slowly and mournfully, "Nora Mansford, 'Is there not a cause!'"

The girl started, and turned white and sick as with fear. She grasped the bench at which George stood to keep herself from falling, and looking at him with eyes that were gleaming with a nameless fear, she said, "What do you know?"

George was almost startled by the effect which the bolt he had suddenly shot had produced, and hastened to reassure her. "Nothing that will ever leave my lips to living mortal, except yourself," he said, "unless my conscience should some day compel me, and then only to save you from that which is worse than death."

There was something so solemn and yet so resolute in George's words and tones, that Nora's terror was increased. She laid her hand upon his arm. Her very touch made him tremble almost as much as she did. "I will know what you mean," said she. "Tell me, what you know! You have always professed to be my friend—"

"Professed!" said George, with overpowering emotion. "O Nora, you know that I could die to do you service, but—"

"You'd better live to do my service while you're in it, which won't be long, my friend, if this goes on."

The speaker was Abram Hardale. He had entered the shop just in time to see Nora's hand on the arm of his journeyman; to see her pleading eyes lifted to his face, and to hear what certainly was as plain spoken a declaration of love as Abram Hardale had ever heard in all his life. Nora had quickly vanished from the scene. George, calling up all his self-command, quietly replied to his angry master.

"You misunderstand the matter, Abram. I can't explain, but it wasn't what you think it was. It is very natural for you to misread me under the circumstances; but, I tell you, you are quite on a wrong track. If that is not satisfactory, I can't help it; and I can't alter it; I can leave your service whenever you think fit."

"The sooner the better," said the irate Abram, not one wit convinced by George's disclaimer.

"Very well," said George, calmly. "I can finish the work I have in hand by Saturday night. Then I shall take my tools and go."

Now Abram Hardale was a long-headed fellow, especially when his own interests were concerned. George Appleton's dismissal, in all likelihood, meant a serious loss to him; particularly so if he should set up business for himself and become Abram's rival. Just now, moreover, after his compact with Gabriel Grubb, and with the probable costs of litigation staring him in the face, he might well have paused longer and pondered more before he parted with such a valuable servant. But Abram Hardale was in a passion; Abram Hardale was proud and masterful and self-willed; and so, as that kind of people so often do, he "put his nose to the grindstone," and turned the handle himself. To his own detriment.

George had received his dismissal, and meant to hold by it; his chief regret being that it might prevent him from keeping effective watch over the interests of Nora, who, as it seemed to him, was putting herself at the mercy of an immoral and unprincipled scoundrel, who possessed an unusual share of good looks and had money galore.

Nora had escaped to the privacy of her own chamber, and there, as on the night of her last clandestine visit to the paddock, she flung herself upon her bed, and wept and groaned in the bitterness of her soul. Could George Appleton have seen her then, he might have come to the conclusion that any interference of his own must be utterly helpless now.

"He would die to do me service! I know it; I feel it," said the poor girl, sobbing the while as if her heart would break. "But if he knew! If he knew! Oh, that I might die! O mother, mother, how I need you now!"

Then she remembered that sainted mother's latest words: "Nora, my darling, when you are motherless, remember that he who has been a husband to the widow, is still the Father of the fatherless. In all your troubles, go and talk to the orphans' Friend."

Here Nora sank upon her knees by her bedside, buried her face in the coverlet, clasped her hands over her head, and prayed and pleaded with heaven for help in this terrible hour of need.

That evening George Appleton found an opportunity to speak to her before he left his work. He was just "straightening up a bit," putting the bench and tools to rights, and making all ready for the morning. When Nora, sad, pale, red-eyed and silent, came into the shop. "Forgive me, Miss Nora," he said "I'm afraid I caused you trouble with your uncle. Miss Nora, I must speak. Don't, don't for the sake of your good name venture to meet that man again. Don't misunderstand me, I will not press my attentions on you. But I would warn you as if you were my own sister. There is awful peril in it—wreck and ruin in it. Don't meet him so again."

"George," said Nora, and she looked as though she could have bent her knee to him, "it seems, though I can't understand it, that some knowledge of my secret has come to you. You have promised to keep it secret. I wish I could follow your advice. But I cannot. I must see him."

He ventured to detain her, as she turned away. "Just one word, Miss Nora, please! If you are in trouble, there are two to whom I counsel you to tell it. Tell it to your God, and then go and tell it to my mother. You can trust her?"

"Yes, George, with my life and soul. But in this matter, I cannot, I dare not speak."

Nora broke away, and carried her load, whatever it was, into her household tasks. It was heavy, for it seemed to bow her even down to the ground.

George Appleton locked up the shop and took the key into the kitchen, to hang it up on its own especial hook at the end of the dresser in the kitchen. Tabitha Crowle was seated near the window with her darning materials, and sundry imperfect stockings waiting for hospital treatment, at her side.

"Tabitha!" said George, for it seemed as though he had room in his mind for only one subject just then, "Tabitha! what is the matter with Nora?"

"Matter! Goodness knows," said Tabitha, "I've asked her to tell me; but bless you, I can mek' oot neither head nor tail of her meanin'. I'm beginnin' to think that she's over head an' ears in love wi' the young squire, and if he's all square an' straight with her, I say let him hev' her, especially if she's goin' to eat herself away and cry her bonny eyes out about it."

"But do you honestly believe she loves him?" said George, with a plaintive eagerness that quite touched Tabitha's tender heart.

"Nay, nay," she said, "who knows? I should have said not, myself. I should have said that there was another young fellow with a good deal more gumption than young Towneley that had a good deal better chance—but there, there's no tellin'. One thing's plain enough, an' that is that she's pinin' herself to fiddlestrings for something or somebody. I say, George," she continued, looking up as if a bright thought had struck her, "Couldn't you get your mother to come and see her?—kind o' casual like, you know. I know, Miss Nora is fond of her, an' your mother's gotten a good heart an' a wise head a-top of it. Ask her, will you?"

"Thank you, Tabitha," said George, heartily, "thank you. You are quite right. I'll tell her what you say."

"Do," said Tabitha, "an' there's another thing, George Appleton, you might sound Old Crusty—"

"Old Crusty and I are going to part, Tabbie."

"What!" quoth Tabitha, suspending her darning in her astonishment. "What for?"

"Incompatibility of temper, I suppose," said the journeyman.

"Incompat' my gran'mother!" exclaimed Tabitha. "Is it your fault or his? If it's yours, you're doin' your old master an ill turn: for the whole business 'll come to grief without you; an' if it's his fault, then he's an old fool that doesn't know on which side his bread's buttered. When are you goin'?"

"On Saturday night. It isn't pleasant to hang around where you aren't wanted."

"A couple of nincompoops!" said the uncompromising Tabitha with severity. "What was it all about?"

Here honest Tabitha fixed her eyes on George's face as with a resolve to get to the bottom of it, with a view probably to an offer of mediation. George blushed like a school-girl beneath her steady gaze. He could not say that it was about Miss Nora; still less could he say that Abram was vexed because he had declared himself willing "to die" for her.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" quoth Tabitha. "I might ha' known if I'd given it half a thought. I can see a hole through a ladder as well as the sharpest eye in Settleworth. He thinks you're not good enough for her, and no more you arn't!"

Here George Appleton thought it advisable to depart. He was quite of Tabitha's opinion as to that point. Had he stayed a little longer he would have heard the conclusion of the sentence.

"Or you would ha' put the question to her yourself, you timorous gawkie."

For a while Tabitha Crowle sat in silence, conducting the process of repair on Abram Hardale's stockings; but her feelings ran high. The darning-needle moved in lunges, and the worsted was twitched after the passage of her weapon, so that the result was somewhat unsatisfactory, and lacked the smoothness and finish which generally marked Tabitha's performances of this kind. She might have been darning Abram Hardale's cuticle rather than his stockings, so vigorously and emphatically did she carry on the occupation.

As the twilight deepened towards darkness, Old Crusty, returning from a business engagement at Towneley Chase, which had occupied some hours, entered the kitchen.

"Well, Tabbie," he said lightly and deprecatingly, as one who would rather be friends than otherwise, for somehow or other he felt that the air was ominously agitated. "You're bringing in blindman's holiday. Mind you don't prick your fingers."

"Never mind me," said Tabitha emphatically, "You're the blind man, an' you never do take a holiday. What post ha' yo' been running your head against, now? You'll be knockin' it clean off one o' these days; and the sooner the better, for if you carry it about wi' you much longer, you'll come to grief as sure as ever my name's Tabitha Crowle."

"Hello! What fat's i' the fire now? Don't boil over so, or you'll put the house in a flame."

"Why it wouldn't much matter if it was, nor the shop neither," said Tabitha, with a noble contempt of grammar, "for you'll ha' precious little need either o' the one or the t'other, if you turn George Appleton away."

"Oh, the pea's under that thimble, is it?" said Abram, who jumped to the conclusion that his refractory journeyman had enlisted Tabitha to arbitrate on his behalf, and was very wrathful at the idea that the establishment would so utterly fail to get on without him that it might as well be burnt to the ground. "George Appleton can be spared so long as Abram Hardale's to the front; tell him to put that in his pipe an' smoke it, Tabitha Crowle. I shall find his room better than his company. In saying that, Abram Hardale was lying, and he knew that he was lying, and Tabitha Crowle knew that he was lying, too. She was not slow in telling him so."

"Abram Hardale!" said she, "You would give your two thumbs to call back the word that sends him going; an' I tell you that if you can't have his 'company,' there will soon be 'room' enough in your shop to set up another business in it, a rope-walk or a coal yard which you like, you foolish man."

"Are you going to marry him, Tabbie?" said Abram, slowly, reverting to his most sarcastic word; "I've often thought you threw your handkerchief at him, but I didn't think he was fool enough to pick it up. Now there'll be two fools joined together, I suppose, that no man can put asunder."

"O no!" said Tabitha whose temper was now thoroughly roused, "all the fool-stuff was used up when you were finished. There was a bit more than was exactly needed, but not enough for another, so they dumped it in, an' there you are!"

Abram Hardale was worsted in the fight, and retired from the field.

LED TO A FLOWER MISSION.

who lived in a city came back from the country with a basket of roses. As she drew near her home, a dirty little boy followed her with wild eyes that she took a rose out of the basket and gave it to him. He ran after her, but before her door was open, she came back again with two other grimy boys. "Please ma'am, have you got one more?" pointing to his companions, who had been begging for bread," she said, "they could not have more eagerly. I gave two more roses to the boys and they dashed off. In fifteen minutes the steps were covered with children, pale, ragged, starved creatures. I do not know where they came from, they seemed to swarm out of the ground. I gave them all my roses, and the flowers in my garden, too, feeling ashamed to think how many I had. Little I valued them, while to the poor they were such priceless treasures. The children ran home with their roses as if it had been a rare jewel. Later on a little waif rang the bell to ask for the house where they gave away the roses. I made up my mind then that it was a flower mission of a great city. I put many happy hours into the raising of such a number of little children.

L GIRL AS AN EVANGELIST.

Following beautiful incident is related by Rev. G. Gregson: "Some years ago I was sitting in my study in Plymouth, when the door opened and a young milliner of my congregation was ushered in. She said 'I have come to tell you I have just received a baptism of the Holy Spirit.' 'How do you know?' I asked in some surprise, for she was one of those from whom I would have expected that she was one of those calm, quiet people, whom I had thought one of the flinty Christians in the congregation. 'How do you know?' What did the Spirit say to you?' I asked, thinking I could say something extravagant, strange and improbable nature. But she replied, 'the first thing the Spirit said to me was, to take my testimony down to the mill and there tell the people about Christ and the wonderful love he had purchased for every one who would take advantage of it.' 'What was plainly the work to which that was called, and she still continues in the mill in which she labors for the bread: and God is abundantly blessing her efforts for his glory and the advancement of his kingdom."

WHY DO I LIVE?

I live for those who love me,
For those I know are true;
For the heaven that smiles above me
And awaits my spirit too;
For all human ties that bind me,
For the task my God assigned me,
For the bright hope left behind me,
And the good that I can do.

I live to learn their story
Who suffered for my sake,
To emulate their glory
And follow in their wake:
Bards, martyrs, patriots, sages,
The nobles of all ages,
Whose deeds crown History's pages
And time's great volume make.

I live to hail the season,
By gifted minds foretold,
When man shall live by reason,
And not alone for gold:
When man to man united,
And every wrong thing righted,
The whole world shall be lighted
As Eden was of old.

I live to hold communion
With all that is divine,
To feel that there is union
'Twixt nature's heart and mine;
To profit by affliction,
Reap truth from fields of fiction,
Grow wiser from conviction, Fulfilling God's design.

I live for those that love me,
For those that know me true,
For the heaven that smiles above me,
And awaits my spirit too;
For the wrongs that need resistance,
For the cause that needs assistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that I can do.

General Booth's Marvellous Book.

"No recent publication on any subject, or by any author, has commanded so much consideration the press, the pulpit and the reading public."

In Darkest England, And The Way Out

By GENERAL BOOTH, of the Salvation Army.

Authorized Edition.—Printed from the plates received direct from London. 8vo, Illustrated with Chart. Paper Edition; 50 cts. Cloth Edition, $1.00. Extra Cloth Edition, $1.50.

In this book General Booth briefly describes the frightful condition of "Darkest Africa," as revealed explorer, Henry M. Stanley, and finds in "Darkest Africa" a fair representation of "Darkest England" goes into minute details and formulates a remarkable and auspicious plan for the emancipation 2,000,000 of the submerged classes of England.

The book was issued in London on October 20th. Within three hours the first large edition was sold and on October 22d the list of individual subscribers to its appeal, at Salvation Headquarters, numbered 3,000.

Archdeacon Farrer, Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, and others have preached sermons in favor scheme, and operations under its provisions have already been commenced. The most intense interest where prevails.

The Churchman, New York, in a review of the book, says: "In the Christian England of this nineteenth century there is a veritable slough of despond worse than Bunyan ever dreamed of. It equals, yes, and it surpasses, the horrors of Dante's deepest hell. To thousands on thousands of its inhabitants no alternative but this is offered—Starve, or Live by Sin! Women are victimized; men are sweated to death. Fevers as numerous and deadly as any in Africa sweep constantly through 'Darkest England' and carry off innumerable sufferers. The raging fever of drink and the 10,000 maladies it causes are incalculably more deadly than all the fevers of Africa put together."

Rev. J. Fulton, New York (in The Churchman): "A scheme which has instantly commanded the profoundest sympathy, and called forth the enthusiastic admiration, not only of the foremost men of Christian communities, but of some of the coolest headed publicists of England. Is the scheme practical? We think it is. In General Booth's hands we believe it will be. Ought the Head of the Salvation Army to be aided in his undertaking? Most emphatically, YES, and ten thousand times, YES."

The Chronicle, London, says: "We are forced to the conclusion that, as far as the lapsed masses are concerned, the Gospel of Christianity has lost in our day its power and charm. When we consider its past resources Booth's project puts the State Church in a very disagreeable position."

The Lutheran Observer says: "Like the appearance of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' General Booth's 'In Darkest England' is more of an event than a book. It is the most powerful, impressive and practical contribution towards the solution of the Social Problem of the age that has yet appeared."

THE WATERS OF MEROM.

DR. TATMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED LAST SUNDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1890, AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" SERVICE IN THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

"And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel," Joshua 11:5.

WE are encamped to-night in Palestine by the waters of Merom. After a long march we have found our tents pitched, our fires kindled, and though far away from civilization, a variety of food that would not compromise a first-class American hotel, for the most of our caravan starts an hour and a half earlier in the morning. We detain only two mules carrying so much of our baggage as we might accidentally need, and a tent for the noonday luncheon. The malarias around this Lake Merom are so poisonous that at any other season of the year encampment here is perilous, but this winter night the air is tonic and healthful. In this neighborhood Joshua fought his last great battle. The nations had banded themselves together to crush this Joshua, but along the banks of these waters Joshua left their carcasses. Indeed it is time that we more minutely examine this Joshua of whom we have in these discourses caught only a momentary glimpse, although he crossed and recrossed Palestine, and next to Jesus is the most stirring and mighty character whose foot ever touched the Holy Land.

Moses was dead. A beautiful tradition says the Lord kissed him, and in that act drew forth the soul of the dying lawgiver. He had been buried, only one person at the funeral, the same One who kissed him. But God never takes a man away from any place of usefulness but he has some one ready. The Lord does not go looking around amid a great variety of candidates to find some one especially fitted for the vacated position. He makes a man for that place. Moses has passed off the stage, and Joshua, the hero, puts his foot on the platform of history so solidly that all the ages echo with the tread. He was a magnificent fighter, but he always fought on the right side, and he never fought unless God told him to fight. He got his military equipment from God, who gave him the promise at the start: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." God fulfilled this promise, although Joshua's first battle was with the spring freshet; and the next with a stone wall; and the next, leading on a regiment of whipped cowards; and the next battle, against undertaking of Joshua was greater than the levelling of Fort Pulaski, or the thundering down of Gibraltar, or the overthrow of the Bastille. It was the crossing of the Jordan at the time of the spring freshet. The snows of Mount Lebanon had just been melting and they poured down into the valley, and the whole valley was a raging torrent. So the Canaanites stand on one bank and they look across and see Joshua and the Israelites, and they laugh and say: "Aha! aha! they cannot disturb us in time—until the freshets fall; it is impossible for them to reach us." But after a while they look across the water and they see a movement in the army of Joshua. They say, "What's the matter now? Why there must be a panic among these troops, and they are going to fly, or perhaps they are going to try to march across the river Jordan. Joshua is a lunatic." But Joshua the chieftain looks at his army and cries: "Forward, march!" and they start for the bank of the Jordan.

One mile ahead go two priests carrying a glittering box four feet long and two feet wide. It is the Ark of the Covenant. And they come down, and no sooner do they just touch the rim of the water with their feet, than by an Almighty fiat, Jordan parts. The army of Joshua marches right on without getting their feet wet, over the bottom of the river, a path of chalk and broken shells and pebbles, until they get to the other bank. Then they lay hold of the oleanders, and tamarisks, and willows, and pull themselves up a bank thirty or forty feet high, and having gained the other bank, they clap their shields and their cymbals, and sing the praises of the God of Joshua. But no sooner have they reached the bank than the waters begin to dash and roar, and with a terrific rush they break loose from their strange anchorage. Out yonder they have stopped, thirty miles of distance they halted. On this side the waters roll off toward the salt sea. But as the hand of the Lord God is taken away from the thus uplifted waters—waters perhaps uplifted half a mile—as the almighty hand is taken away, those waters rush down, and some of the unbelieving Israelites say, "Alas, alas, what a misfortune! Why could not those waters have stayed parted? Because perhaps we may want to go back. O Lord, we are engaged in a risky business. Those Canaanites may eat us up. How if we want to go back? Would it not have been a more complete miracle if the Lord had parted the waters to let us come through, and kept them parted to let us go back if we are defeated?" My friends, God makes no provision for a Christian's retreat. He clears the path all the way to Canaan. To darkness, wheeling the sun and the moon into his battalion, and the last, against the King of terrors, Death—five great victories.

For the most part, when the general of an army starts out in a conflict he would like to have a small battle in order that he may get his courage up and he may rally his troops and get them drilled for greater conflicts; but this first back is to die. The same gatekeepers that ing back the amethystine and crystalline gate the Jordan to let Israel pass through now ing shut the amethystine and crystalline gate the Jordan to keep the Israelites from going ck. I declare it in your hearing to-day, vic- y ahead, water thirty feet deep behind you, ath and darkness and woe and hell. But you : "Why didn't those Canaanites, when they d such a splendid chance—standing on the o of the bank thirty or forty feet high, com- pletely demolish those poor Israelites down in e river?" I will tell you why. God had made promise and he was going to keep it. "There all not any man be able to stand before thee e days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host to stop. Joshua gives the command, "Forward, march!" the distance there is a long grove of trees, d at the end of the grove is a city. It is a y of arbors, a city with walls seeming to reach the heaven, to buttress the very sky. It is e great metropolis that commands the moun- n pass. It is Jericho. That city was afterward ptured by Pompey, and it was afterward cap- tured by Herod the Great, and it was afterward ptured by the Mohammedans; but this mpaign the Lord plans. There shall be no rds, no shields, no ttering ram. There all be only one weap- of war, and that a m's horn. The horn the slain ram was metimes taken and les were punctured it, and then the mu- sian would put the trument to his lips, d he would run his gers over this rude usical instrument, d make a great deal sweet harmony for e people. That was e only kind of weap- . Seven priests were take these rude stic musical instru- ents, and they were go around the city ery day for six days once a day for six ys, and then on the vventh day they were go around blowing ese rude musical in- truments seven times, d then at the close of e seventh blowing of the rams' horns on the vventh day, the peroration of the whole scene as to be a shout at which those great walls ould tumble from capstone to base.

The seven priests with the rude musical in- truments pass all around the city walls on the st day, and a failure. Not so much as a piece f plaster broke loose from the wall—not so uch as a loosened rock, not so much as a piece f mortar lost from its place. "There," say e unbelieving Israelites, "didn't I tell you so? Why, those ministers are fools. The idea of ing around the city with those musical in- truments and expecting in that way to destroy ! Joshua has been spoiled; he thinks because e has overthrown and destroyed the spring resh, he can overthrow the stone wall. Why is not philosophic. Don't you see there is no elation between the blowing of these musical truments and the knocking down of the wall? isn't philosophy." And I suppose there were any wisacres who stood with their brows nitted, and with the forefinger of the right and to the forefinger of the left hand, arguing all out, and showing it was not possible that uch a cause could produce such an effect. nd I suppose that night in the encampment ere was plenty of philosophy and caricature, nd if Joshua had been nominated for any high ilitary position, he would not have got many otes.

Joshua's stock was down. The second day, the priests blowing the musical instruments go around the city, and a failure. Third day, and a failure; fourth day, and a failure; fifth day, and a failure; sixth day, and a failure. The seventh day comes, the climacteric day. Joshua is up early in the morning and examines the troops, walks all around about, looks at the city wall. The priests start to make the circuit of the city. They go all around once, all around twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, seven times, and a failure.

There is only one more thing to do, and that is to utter a great shout. I see the Israelitish army straightening themselves up, filling their lungs for a vociferation such as was never heard before and never heard after. Joshua feels that the hour has come, and he cries out to his host: "Shout; for the Lord hath given you the city!" All the people begin to cry: "Down, Jericho, down Jericho!" and the long line of solid masonry begins to quiver and to move and to rock. Stand from under! She falls! Crash! go the walls, the temples, the towers, the palaces; the air blackened with the dust. The huzza of the victorious Israelites and the groan of the conquered Canaanites commingle, and Joshua standing there in the debris of the wall, hears a voice saying: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

Only one house spared. Who lives there? Some great king? No. Some woman distinguished for great kindly deeds? No. She had been conspicuous for her crimes. It is the house of Rahab. Why was her house spared? Because she had been a great sinner? No, but because she repented, demonstrating to all the ages that there is mercy for the chief of sinners. The red cord of divine injunction reaching from her window to the ground, so that when the people saw that red cord they knew it was the divine indication they should not disturb the premises; making us think of the divine cord of a Saviour's deliverance, the red cord of a Saviour's kindness, the red cord of a Saviour's mercy, the red cord of our rescue. Mercy for the chief of sinners. Put your trust in that God, and no damage shall befall you. When our world shall be more terribly surrounded than was Jericho, even by the trumpets of the judgment day, and the hills and the mountains, the metal bones and ribs of nature, shall break, they who have had Rahab's faith shall have Rahab's deliverance.

When wrapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
And Heaven's last thunder shakes the earth below;
Thou undismayed shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile.

But Joshua's troops may not halt here. The command is, "Forward, march!" There is the city of Ai; it must be taken. How shall it be taken? A scouting party comes back and says: "Joshua, we can do that without you; it is going to be a very easy job; you just stay here while we go and capture it." They march with a small regiment in front of that city. The men of Ai look at them and give one yell, and the Israelites run like reindeer. The Northern troops at Bull Run did not make such rapid time as these Israelites with the Canaanites after them. They never cut such a sorry figure as when they were on the retreat. Anybody that goes out in the battles of God with only half a force, instead of your taking the men of Ai, the men of Ai will take you. Look at the Church of God on the retreat. The Bornesian cannibals ate up Munson the missionary. "Fall back!" said a great many Christian people—"Fall back, O Church of God! Borneo will never be taken. Don't you see the Bornesian cannibals have eaten up Munson, the missionary?" Tyndall delivers his lecture at the University of Glasgow, and a great many good people say, "Fall back, O Church of God! Don't you see that Christian philosophy is going to be overcome by worldly philosophy? Fall back." Geology plunges its crowbar into the mountains, and there are a great many people who say, "Scientific investigation is going to overthrow the Mosaic account of the Creation. Fall back!" Friends of the Church have never had any right to fall back.

Joshua falls on his face in chagrin. It is the only time you ever see the back of his head. He falls on his face and begins to whine, and he says, "O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? Would to God we had been content and dwelt on the other side of Jordan! For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth."

I am very glad Joshua said that. Before, it seemed as if he were a supernatural being, and therefore could not be an example to us; but I find he is a man, he is only a man. Just as sometimes you find a man under severe opposition, or in a bad state of physical health, or worn out with overwork, lying down, and sighing about everything being defeated. I am encouraged when I hear this cry of Joshua as he lies in the dust.

MOSES CONSECRATES JOSHUA.

God comes and rouses him. How does he rouse him? By complimentary apostrophe? No. He says, "Get thee up. Wherefore liest thou upon thy face?" Joshua rises, and I warrant you with a mortified look. But his old courage comes back. The fact was, that was not his battle. If he had been in it he would have gone on to victory. He gathers his troops around him and says: "Now, let us go up and capture the city of Ai: let us go up right away."

They march on. He puts the majority of the troops behind a ledge of rocks in the night, and then he sends comparatively small regiments up in front of the city. The men of Ai come out with a shout. The small regiments of Israelites in stratagem fall back and fall back, and when all the men of Ai have left the city and are in pursuit of these scattered, or seemingly scattered regiments, Joshua stands on a rock—I see his locks flying in the wind as he points his spear toward the doomed city, and that is the signal. The men rush out from behind the rocks and take the city, and it is put to the torch, and then these Israelites in the city march down and the flying regiments of Israelites return, and between these two waves of Israelitish prowess the men of Ai are destroyed, and the Israelites gain the victory; and while they see the curling smoke of that destroyed city in the sky, and while I hear the huzza of the Israelites and the groan of the Canaanites, Joshua utters something louder than it all, ringing and going through his soul, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host of Joshua to stop. "Forward, march!" cries Joshua to the troops. There is the city of Gibeon. It has at itself under the protection of Joshua. They find word, "There are five kings after us; they are going to destroy us; send troops quick; and us help right away." Joshua has a three-days' march more than double quick. On the morning of the third day he is before the enemy. There are two long lines of battle. The battle opens with great slaughter, but the Canaanites soon discover something. They say, "That is Joshua; that is

The Man Who Conquered
The spring freshet and knocked down the stone wall and destroyed the city of Ai. There is no use fighting." And they sound a retreat, and as they begin to retreat, Joshua and his host ring upon them like a panther, pursuing them over the rocks, and as the Canaanites retreat, the catapults of the sky pour a volley of hailstones into the valley, and all the artillery of the heavens with bullets of iron, pound the Canaanites against the ledges of Beth-horon. "Oh!" says Joshua, "this is surely a victory." But do you not see the sun is going down? Those Amorites are going to get away after all, and then they will come up some other time and bother us, and perhaps destroy us. See, the sun is going down. Oh, for a longer day than has ever been seen in this climate! What is the matter with Joshua? Has he fallen in an apoplectic fit? No. He is in prayer. Look when a good man makes the Lord his ally. Joshua raises his face, radiant with prayer, and looks at the descending sun over Gibeon and at the faint crescent of the moon, for you know the queen of the night sometimes will linger around the palaces of the day. Pointing one hand at the descending sun and the other hand the faint crescent of the moon, in the name of that God who shaped the worlds and moves worlds, he cries: "Sun, stand thou still on Gibeon; and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon." They halted. Whether it was by reflection of the sun's rays, or by the stopping of the whole planetary system, I do not know, and do not care. I leave it to the Christian scientists and the infidel scientists to settle that question, while I tell you I have seen the same thing. "What!" say you, "not the sun standing still?" Yes. The same miracle is performed nowadays. The wicked do not live out half their day, and the sun sets at noon. But let a man start out in battle for God and the truth, and against sin, and the day of his usefulness is prolonged and prolonged and prolonged.

John Summerfield was a consumptive Methodist. He looked fearfully white, I am told, as he stood in old Sands Street Church, in Brooklyn, preaching Christ, and when he stood on the anniversary platform in New York, pleading for the Bible until unusual and unknown glories rolled forth from that book. When he was dying his pillow was brushed with the wings of the angel from the skies, the messenger that God sent down. Did John Summerfield's sun set? Did John Summerfield's day end? Oh, no! He lives on in his burning utterances in behalf of the Christian Church.

McCheyne's Death.

Robert McCheyne was a consumptive Presbyterian. It was said when he preached, he coughed so it seemed as if he would never preach again. His name is fragrant in all Christendom, that name mightier to-day than was ever his living presence. He lived to preach the Gospel in Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Dundee, but he went away very early. He preached himself into the grave. Has Robert McCheyne's sun set? Is Robert McCheyne's day ended? Oh, no! His dying delirium was filled with prayer, and when he lifted his hand to pronounce the benediction upon his family, and the benediction upon his country, he seemed to say: "I cannot die now; I want to live on and on. I want to start an influence for the Church that will never cease. I am only thirty years of age. Sun of my Christian ministry, stand still over Scotland." And it stood still.

A long time ago there was a Christian woman very consecrated, and she had a drunken husband, and so on came the night of domestic trouble. She lost her children, and there came the night of bereavement. She was very ill, and there came the night of sickness. Her soul departed, and there came the night of death. But all these nights of trouble, and darkness, and sorrow, and sickness were illumined by the grace of the Gospel; and people came many miles to see how cheerfully a Christian could be sick and how cheerfully a Christian could die. The moon that illumined that night of trouble was a reflection from the Sun of Righteousness. In the last hour of that night—that night of darkness and sickness and misfortune, as she lifted her hand toward heaven, those who stood nearest her pillow could hear the whisper—for she wanted to live on in the generations that were to follow, consecrated to God; she wanted to have an influence long after she had entered upon her eternal reward, and while her hand was lifted and her lips were moving, those who stood nearest her pillow could hear her say, "Thou moon, stand still in the valley of Ajalon."

But Joshua was not quite through. There was time for five funerals before the sun of that prolonged day set. Who will preach their funeral sermon? Massillon preached the funeral sermon over Louis XVI. Who will preach the funeral sermon of those five dead kings—King of Jerusalem, King of Hebron, King of Jarmuth, King of Lachish, King of Eglon? Let it be by Joshua. What is his text? What shall be the epitaph put on the door of the tomb? "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

Five Hateful Despots.

But before you fasten up the door, I want five more kings beheaded and thrust in: King Alcohol, King Fraud, King Lust, King Superstition, King Infidelity. Let them be beheaded and hurl them in. Then fasten up the door forever. What shall the inscription and what shall the epitaph be? For all Christian philanthropists of all ages are going to come and look at it. What shall the inscription be? "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But it is time for Joshua to go home. He is a hundred and ten years old. Washington went down the Potomac and at Mount Vernon closed his days. Wellington died peacefully at Apsley House. Now, where shall Joshua rest? Why, he is to have his greatest battle now. After a hundred and ten years he has to meet a king, who has more subjects than all the present population of the earth, his throne a pyramid of skulls, his parterre the graveyards and the cemeteries of the world, his chariot the world's hearse—the King of Terrors. But if this is Joshua's greatest battle, it is going to be Joshua's greatest victory. He gathers his friends around him and gives and it is full of reminiscence. Young men tell what they are going to do; old men tell what they have done. And as you have heard a grandfather, or great-grandfather, seated by the evening fire, tell of Monmouth or Yorktown, and then lift the crutch or staff as though it were a musket, to fight, and show how the old battles were won—so Joshua gathers his friends around his dying couch, and he tells them the story of what he has been through, and as he lies there, his white locks snowing down on his wrinkled forehead, I wonder if God has kept his promise all the way through. As he lies there he tells the story one, two, or three times—you have heard old people tell a story two or three times over—and he answers: "I go the way of all the earth, and not one word of the promise has failed, not one word thereof has failed; all has come to pass, not one word thereof has failed." And then he turns to his family, as a dying parent will, and says: "Choose now whom you will serve, the God of Israel, or the God of the Amorites. As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

A Dying Parent

cannot be reckless or thoughtless of his children. Consent to part with them forever at the door of the tomb we cannot. By the cradle in which their infancy was rocked, by the bosom on which they first lay, by the blood of the covenant, by the God of Joshua, it shall not be. We will not part, we cannot part. Jehovah-Jireh, we take thee at thy promise. "I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee."

Dead, the old chieftain must be laid out. Handle him very gently; that sacred body is over a hundred and ten years of age. Lay him out, stretch out those feet that walked dry shod the parted Jordan. Close those lips which helped blow the blast at which the walls of Jericho fell. Fold the arm that lifted the spear toward the doomed city of Ai. Fold it right over the heart that exulted when the five kings fell. But where shall we get the burnished granite for the headstone and the footstone? I bethink myself now. I imagine that for the head it shall be the sun that stood still upon Gibeon, and for the foot, the moon that stood still in the valley of Ajalon.

THE JUDSON MEMORIAL CHURCH.

The Splendid Edifice in Memory of the "Apostle of Burmah" Reared by his Son.

WASHINGTON Square, long a social and historic landmark in New York, has in late years undergone many changes. New buildings of a modern style of architecture have superseded the old-fashioned mansions that once were the residences of the leading families on Manhattan Island. Most striking of all the recent changes in the Square is the splendid new church edifice a picture of which appears on the first page.

The erection of the church is due to the efforts of the Rev. Dr. Edward Judson, the son of the "Apostle of Burmah," as the famous missionary was called, in recognition of the great work he had done in that heathen land for the Gospel of Christ. Two years ago, in August, 1888, on the centennial anniversary of the birth of the missionary, the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies. The building now almost completed, will represent a cost of $188,000, and the site a sum of $132,000—a total of $320,000. There is a prospect that the whole will be raised and that when the edifice is opened, it will be free from debt.

The architecture of the Judson Memorial Church is of the Italian Renaissance style, the materials being yellow pressed brick, white marble, and terra-cotta. The design is as unconventional as the purpose and method of the founder, and it will be the first experiment of its kind in this country. Thus the son, like the venerated father, carries into his work the spirit of the pioneer and a zeal and energy directed by high moral purpose.

There are two fields of Christian work: the one is the ordinary field in which all the influences converge to the advancement of religion. The people have had Christian parents. Their associations are with Christian people. Their mental tendency is in a religious direction. All the minister has to do is to perform his pastoral duties, visiting, etc., preach two sermons on the Sunday and an able mid-week discourse, and the Church grows naturally. Its finances keep up and there is no deficit at the end of the year. The minister looks around and is satisfied with the growth of the Church. Like a well-gathered flock, everyone bears the distinguishing marks of the religious influences of previous generations.

The other field of work is very different. It is that of the highways and the hedges. Members of the flock have not the Christian brand upon them, but their predisposition and surroundings have all tended contrary to religion. How are we to reach these? The two sermons—the mid-week discourse and the pastoral visits—have no influence there. A Church planted among such people inevitably tends to decay, under the ordinary methods. They may come to a first or a second service, but they do not come again. The Church must not change its location but its methods. It must adopt earnest, persistent aggressive tactics. Then enters the question of funds. Aggressive work costs money. In Thompson Street or any of the back streets, it costs from fifty to seventy-five dollars a month to hire a common dive in which to hold the meetings for the rescue of these outcasts. Teachers are needed for each grade of the school Dr. Judson wishes to establish. There must be a Secretary for the work which is analagous to that the Young Men's Christian Association is doing amongst other classes. Money is required for all these things; and that is the problem Dr. Judson is attempting to solve.

As one means toward solving the problem the idea of the apartment house, shown on the right of the picture, has been suggested. It will be conducted on purely business principles. Its location in the neighborhood of the large dry-goods district will make it a desirable residence for clerks and the better class of employees. Excellent rooms will be provided as in a first-class hotel, and Dr. Judson expects that it will be a source of considerable revenue. This revenue will be rigidly excluded from the current expenses of the church—the church must support itself. He will devote the income from the apartment house to the aggressive work he contemplates and is devising other means of adding to that revenue, on the same principle, to form a permanent endowment. His one aim and supreme desire is to obey the Master's injunction to go out into the highways and hedges and bring in the outcasts. He proposes by schools, by reading-rooms, by amusements, to attract the young people, who would otherwise be allured by the saloon and vicious haunts of the neighborhood—to win the men and women for Christ. He does not propose to abandon the preaching and the ordinary pastoral work; while from the location of the church the aggressive part will be its main feature, he will not do that and leave the other undone.

Adoniram Judson, to whose memory this splendid pile is now reared, was the son of a Congregationalist preacher of Malden, Mass., where he was born in 1788. He entered college at sixteen, taking high honors while yet a mere lad. In 1808 he was converted and dedicated himself solemnly to God. Some months later he felt himself called to go as a missionary to the heathen, and in 1811 he set out for Calcutta. He depended solely for support on the Baptist Churches at home. He was peremptorily forbidden to labor in India by the agent of the East India Company, who at that time was in supreme control. After making inquiries he set out for Burmah, in 1813. At that time there was not a single Christian in the country.

The history of the next thirteen years' work forms one of the most thrilling stories in the record of Christian labor. Amid danger from the barbaric king, and discouragements from the natives, he labored on, and partially translated the Bible. It was six years before he baptized a single convert, and then the number slowly increased to ten, including one woman and a man of distinguished learning. In 1824, when he was making better progress, war broke out between Burmah and England, and Dr. Judson was arrested on suspicion of being a spy. He was imprisoned for twenty-one months in a wretched hovel with his ankles chained together by heavy fetters. During that time the invaluable manuscript of his translation of the Bible was saved from his enemies who would have destroyed it, by being sewn up in a dirty pillow on which every night the doctor gratefully laid his head. When he was released, he found his wife prostrated by the efforts she had made to mitigate his sufferings during his imprisonment. She died the same year, while he was bringing her home to recuperate her strength. He remained in Burmah till 1845, and then, after thirty-three years' absence, paid a brief visit to America. He returned in 1846, and commenced the arduous labor of preparing a Burmese dictionary, preaching and teaching with all his former vigor, though he was then nearly sixty years of age. In 1850, he was prostrated with fever and died at sea on April 12th.

The Rev. Edward Judson, founder of the Memorial Church, is a man in the prime of life and full of vigor and earnestness for the great work in which he is engaged. About nine years ago he resigned the pastorate of the large and wealthy Baptist Church at Orange, N. J., and came to New York. He became pastor of the Berean Baptist Church at Bedford and Downing Streets, and at once addressed himself to the task of city evangelization. There he has carried on for several years a kindergarten, Sunday School, tract repository, lodging-house, coal-and-wood yard, young men's club, and a fresh air and flower mission in connection with the church. The new work on which he is now about to enter is therefore only the broadening of a field in which he has already been laboring diligently and conscientiously. With the divine blessing, he will make the Judson Memorial Church and its institutions a light-house on the shoals of the sinful metropolis pointing the wanderer to Christ.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Widow's Suit Against an Insurance Company was decided by Justice Parker in Albany, N. Y., on December 11. Her deceased husband had during his lifetime effected an insurance for ten thousand dollars on his life. When it was written, through inadvertence, the space for the beneficiary's name was left blank. The man paid his premiums up to his death, in January last. The company refused payment on the policy because of the omission of the name. Judge Parker directed that the ten thousand dollars with interest from May 10, 1890, and costs of action be paid by the company to the widow. It is strange that the company should have required to be sued if, as may be inferred, the widow could prove that she was the heiress of her husband. She very naturally took legal steps to compel payment and has been successful. She did not act as many do about the promises of God's word. It is often difficult to convince them that the promises are for them, though the word "whosoever" includes them as plainly as if their names were written (Rev. 22:17).

A Compromise Dollar is Proposed as a Solution of the vexed question of the silver and gold standard. Gen. Berdan, whose suggestion it is, states in a letter written last week to the chairman of the National Silver Executive Committee, that it has the approval of a large number of prominent men, both in Congressional and financial circles. The scheme is to make a dollar of gold and silver, mechanically combined, by first making a silver coin worth twenty-five cents, with a hole in the centre, and then pressing in the hole a plug of gold that is worth seventy-five cents. The number of grains of silver employed is to be fixed by Congress. Such a dollar would not only do away with the serious objections raised by all to the weight and size of the present silver dollar, but the smallness of the gold dollar also. The General points out that, by putting a rim around the gold centre, the coin would be distinguishable from a quarter, even in the dark, by the sense of touch. Whether this suggestion will share the usual fate of compromises, and be offensive to the advocates of both the rival standards, remains to be seen. Should it be adopted, the coin for which our people will struggle will be much like the prize that Christian workers toil to win. The soul, like the gold in the centre of the coin, is what gives value to the man, not the inferior metal surrounding it. As the apostle said, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." (II. Cor. 4:7.)

A Churchyard Eviction was Executed in New York last week. Workmen were busy for several days opening the vaults under old St. Luke's Church in Hudson Street, the site of which has been sold for building purposes. Over six hundred coffins were taken out and removed to the cemeteries of Woodlawn and Mount Hope. The names on the coffin lids were those of old New York families, some of which are now almost forgotten. In the vault of the Ten Broeck family there were twenty coffins. Many of them were decayed and molding away, but the older coffins which were made of St. Domingo mahogany were still stanch and strong. One old man came to look at the remains of his departed relatives. He found the coffin containing his mother's remains. It was opened, and there lay her long, shining hair, undisturbed and uninjured. He took a lock of the hair and put it away in his pocket. When he reached home and took it out, it was crumbled and broken, and scarcely recognizable as hair. They came upon the coffin of a clergyman and opened it. There he lay stretched out in his silk surplice, the body being only a skeleton, but the silk was unchanged. It was a strange, weird sight, that of the pile of coffins interred so long ago. To the reflective spectator the thought was suggestive of the difference between this disturbance of the graves and that which is coming. Now the bodies are insensible and unconcerned, but then, they "that sleep in the dust of the earth will awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." (Daniel 12:2.)

THE INSPIRATION OF THE ADVENT.

THE work of the preaching of the Gospel to all nations as a witness to them, and enlisting an advance column from all lands to meet the Master at his coming, is being done with a good degree of success. Considering the worldliness of the Churches, and the prevailing apathy of Christians—that both the wise and the foolish virgins sleep together, waiting for the midnight cry to announce the approach of the Bridegroom—the work that has waited two thousand years goes on with a degree of hopefulness not witnessed before since the ascension of Christ. It is wonderful how, within the past half century, the world has been opening to a broader fraternity than it ever before knew. The kingdoms of the earth are rapidly becoming one great family of nations; not without jealousies and suspicions, it is true, but mutually tolerant and peaceful from policy. Philanthropic effort, scientific research, commercial enterprise and greed for gold are opening highways through all the dreary deserts of the globe. Along these highways the kingdom of Christ is marching. Not a few of them it has made for itself. Behind and beneath all these moving forces of nature and Providence is the hand of God, unseen save by faith, silently directing and controlling all in the interest of his ultimate designs. The world is open to the Gospel; let the Gospel be given to every creature. And then shall the end come.

To Consecration of Wealth.

It is marvellous to consider how much wealth Providence has placed in the hands of Christian men within the last fifty years. Many of them are liberal in the use of their means, that is, liberal according to the popular standard, and the measure of other men's giving. But what they give is only as the dust of the balance compared with what they have and do not give. The rich givers are lauded much, and the poor who give at a sacrifice are not noticed save by him who sits over against the treasury and observes how men cast in their gifts. Now as then, the poor widow who casts in her two mites, which were all her living, is observed and commended above the rich, who give of their superfluity. The world is not to be converted by gold; but gold is needed to furnish many of the appliances for the universal spread of the Gospel. When Christian hearts are consecrated to Christ, Christian wealth will be consecrated to a preparation for his coming and kingdom.

Then there arises the question of the application of the funds that are given. Can it be a right division of the ten million dollars raised by one denomination in our country that apportion only one million to missions and all the rest to salaries and home services? Our churches are reported to have not less than fifty-eight millions invested in Church Property.

While the great majority of these edifices are, no doubt, plain enough, yet can it be a wise disposition of property to invest so much in brick and mortar, wood and stone, while the world waits for the bread of life, and Christ stands before the door? Every place of worship should be neat, attractive and commodious, but the disparity seems great between what we do for ourselves, and what we do for the world for which Christ died. Let us decide all questions of conscience and conduct, "that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

If again it be asked, by those who disbelieve or those who doubt, how the personal presence of Christ among men should tend to more rapid conversion of the world since now we have the same Gospel truth, and the same Omnipotent Spirit to give it efficacy, it may be answered: is it conceivable that "the Lord whom ye seek could come suddenly to his temple," and not quicken all the pulses of Christian life and activity? If that event, should occur to-day, there would be ten thousand Christians in these great cities, leaving the marts of trade and their ordinary pursuits, threading the thoroughfares, visiting the market-places, unabashed, announcing the presence of the King, and beseeching men to be reconciled to God. If it were known that the Divine One was among us, and that he might at any time appear unannounced to his people, as he appeared to Mary and the women, as he appeared to Peter, to the two disciples as they journeyed, to the seven on the shore of Tiberias, or to the more than five hundred at one time—and no man could know when or where, he should reveal himself—what a revolution would it produce in Christian society! When he might appear suddenly in the pastor's study, the doors being shut—when in the prayer meeting—when in the public congregation of worshippers—when in the huts of the poor and the lowly—when an uninvited guest in the palace home of the rich—when with the humble, heart-sick and discouraged workers, and when with the vain, worldly-minded disciples, none could know. It would be Christ Immanent.

Would not the minister preach differently if he thought it possible that august auditor might be present, even though his eyes were holden that he should not know him? Would not the people hear differently, and the old, tame and insipid truths, take on new life and beauty, while itching ears should lose taste for inane travesties, by courtesy called sermons, now so much in demand to attract curious auditors, and please a carnal taste?

With such inspirations to holy exertion, can we fail to "watch and be saved; putting on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation;" watching before God who quickeneth all things, "keeping the commandments without spot, unrebukable until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ?"

It is, moreover, an inspiration to patience amidst the toils and trials of Christian service in a life like this. "For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promise." "For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." The currents of this world set against godliness. He who would live godly in Christ Jesus, must encounter much opposition, and perhaps suffer persecution. How shall the devout and godly attain and maintain the loftier standard of Christian morals, as against the lower and more prevalent standard of secular morals, so largely apparent in Christian society? It cannot be done without a struggle; without a constant conflict.

To Personal Consecration.

All this, of course, is well understood. The theory is admitted and familiar; nevertheless practical godliness is not an easy task, against all the opposing forces. Faith falters, the spirit faints, the flesh is weak, the burden is a heavy one to bear, the heart grows sick with discouragement, hands hang down and feet grow weary climbing the rugged heights, even though it be towards purer air and cloudless light. How can the saints endure the discouragements, and not utterly faint? Cannot the very stringent conditions of discipleship be modified and made more easy? Some seem to be trying the experiment. Has not the world grown good enough, by the pervading influence of Christian civilization, for the saints to cease fighting it? One would suppose that thousands of professing disciples had come to such a conclusion. Has Christ's army of conquest become simply an army of occupation? Has it agreed upon a truce, gone into winter quarters for rest and recreation, while the hosts of darkness lie entrenched on every side, in front and rear, alert and vigilant to maintain their ground? Such seeming facts, though they be not altogether real, make those who hope for the triumph of the right, and long for his appearing, sad and heavy-hearted. The terms of discipleship are all unchanged. Jesus said, "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." "And whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple. Simply he cannot be my disciple!"

But in all these conditions "tribulation worketh patience, patience worketh experience, and experience hope." "And ye have need of patience that after ye have done the will of God, ye might inherit the promises." The trial of faith worketh patience. "Therefore be patient, brethren unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. Be ye also patient; establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." With such great and most blessed things in view, assured by faith, and God's most faithful Word, his tried and discouraged and even suffering people can well afford to wait, and patiently to hope until the end, for the fulfillment of the promises. "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ. And so the certainty of the advent and the signs of its near approach, become the supreme inspiration to watchfulness and prayer.

THE FALL OF A STATESMAN.

A Story of the Golden Text for Jan. 4. "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." Prov. 16: 18.

A STRANGE and suggestive story is that which history gives us of the wonderful man who in the reign of Henry VIII., of England, rose to supreme power in that land. It is a period worthy of study. The feudal system was nearing the end of its long life. But it still had in it the vigor of its earlier years; though not the vigor that could resist the growing power which was to undermine and overthrow it. The great nobles still lived like kings, exercising regal powers over their retainers, but they were now held accountable for the manner in which they exercised those powers. Henry, the much abused king, was a better man, with all his faults and undoubted shortcomings, than we were taught to believe. He was concerned for the welfare of his people and saw to it that they were not crushed by the powerful lords. It was at that time, when the lords were on the alert to grasp their vanishing power and to maintain their old time privileges, that they saw with mortification and chagrin the real power in the kingdom vested in the hands of a man whom they despised as much as they dreaded.

The chancellorship with all its emoluments, and all its powers was held by Wolsey. We, in our democratic time and country cannot conceive what that meant to nobles whose ancestors had stood by the Conqueror when he landed and to whom other kings since then had turned for advice and help. Birth counted for much in those days. This Wolsey was a man of the common people. The son of a butcher, some said. A man outside and beneath the privileged ruling class. They felt as the officers of a regiment might feel if the command of the regiment were given to a man who had been employed in waiting at table, or in performing menial offices about the stables. That the king should entrust the great offices of state to this low-born man, should consult with him about the policy and government of the kingdom, was a personal affront to every man of noble blood in the realm. True, he was a man of singular ability, and a man of great learning, according to the standard of those times, while their merits consisted chiefly in their prowess in arms and their skill as soldiers. Henry was shrewd enough to realize that in the rapidly changing social order he needed a statesman, rather than a soldier, as his chief adviser.

Wolsey might have vanquished his enemies had he been prudent. He might have disarmed their animosity by serving his king and country humbly; for he could render service to both which the nobles could not render. But, as with many other men, his elevation made him proud and arrogant. The magnifi-of his private life was equal to the king's. He treated the Lords with contumely, scorned them as ignorant bores, and repaid their hatred with contempt. It was charged that he had ten "I and my king," on certain documents, though even the king came after him in his estimation. He insisted on precedence, retaining all the pomp and circumstance of power as well as its substance. The nobles might have been sure to see one of their own rank and order so honored, but that they should have to wait his summons for audience with their king, that they should have to ride in procession below "the head of the Ipswich butcher," was unendurable. They knew what they suffered, and he made his burden more bitter by his sneers, his insults and his patronage. Strong in the king's favor or he defied them with insulting defiance. It was a perilous position. "Put not thy trust in princes," was the counsel of the Book, but he, as a cardinal of the Church, was supposed to have studied. When he came to the throne in his public life where two ways met, and he chose the way that appeared to him the way of his interests, yet the way involving the king's resentment, he stood alone. Of all the men who might have helped him in that extremity there was not one who did not rejoice in the prospect of his downfall. Not one of the great men and nobles, would say a word in his favor; for every one had been alienated by his pride and arrogance. His fall was sudden and dire. The great dramatist represents him old and sick and despised, as saying in his misery, "Had I but served my God with half the zeal I served my king, he would not in my old age have left me naked to mine enemies."

THE KINGDOM DIVIDED.

8. LESSON FOR JAN. 4, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
I. KINGS. 12 : 1-17 ; GOLDEN TEXT, PROV. 16 : 18.

Solomon's Example More Potent than His Counsel—Rehoboam's Observation of his Father Detrimental to Him—Opportunities and Gifts Increasing Responsibility—The Warning to Solomon—The Coronation—Popular Discontent—A Petition for Reduced Taxation—Conciliation Advised—Rehoboam's Arrogant Answer.

THE greatest blessing for which the Lord Jesus could pray for his disciples before he was taken from them was unity; "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou has sent me." (John 17 : 21.) The Godhead consists in infinite unity. Self divides; God unites; and when he divides, it is in judgment. It was so in the time of Rehoboam.

A father's example has more weight with his son than any amount of exhortation or preaching. The book of Proverbs is full of the wisest, most comprehensive and detailed exhortations to Solomon's son how to direct his life. But when that son, who was exhorted to keep himself "from the strange woman, from the stranger which flattereth with her words" (Prov. 7 : 5, 27), saw that his father "loved many strange women," and that "his wives turned away his heart" (I. Kings 11 : 1, 3), is it to be wondered at that the father's words fell powerless on the ear of the son? When Solomon would have had his son "trust in the Lord with all [his] heart, and lean not to [his] own understanding," and said, "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths," and yet that very father's heart was "not perfect with the Lord his God," he "did evil in the sight of the Lord," and, although he did not himself sacrifice to idols, he facilitated his wives' idolatry by building high places for their gods (I. Kings 11 : 4, 10),—is it to be wondered at that Rehoboam heeded not such exhortations? Solomon could say to his son, "Receive my instruction, and not silver, and knowledge, rather than choice gold" (Prov. 8 : 10), but when he saw on his father's table, and all around him in "the house of the forest of Lebanon," every vessel of gold, and when he watched the unloading of his father's merchant ships, bringing gold and silver" (I. Kings 10 : 21), the wholesome exhortation could not outweigh the natural self-importance of a foolish young man who saw himself heir to all this wealth.

"The world by wisdom knew not God." (I. Cor. 1 : 21.) All Solomon's wisdom, truly God's gift to him, did not procure the conversion of his son. "The unfeigned faith" which dwelt in the aged Lois, and in her daughter Eunice, (II. Tim. 1 : 5) descended to the youthful Timothy, just because it was "unfeigned," and because these two holy women lived in the which their faith taught them. Timothy saw and felt the presence of God in the house, while Rehoboam could exult in the wonderful wisdom, riches, and power of his father, but the presence of God was not brought to bear upon him.

Many a son who has nothing himself to boast of, is inflated with pride by reason of some family distinction. Either he is the son of a bishop, or perhaps of some well-known preacher, and values himself on that account, or he is descended from the aristocracy, and this is the ground of boasting, or perhaps he is the son of a famous author, or some relation of a noted politician. Many of those who seek for distinction by holding on to the skirts of wiser, better, or more talented men than they, are the most conceited of men. Rehoboam was probably of this class. He seems to have in no way inherited his father's wisdom, but to have been a remarkably foolish young man. How far this is attributable to his father's declension only eternity will reveal.

Solomon's Privileges.

When Solomon was born "the Lord loved him." (II. Sam. 12 : 24.) He was born at the time when David was deeply humbled, and broken before his God because of his terrible sin. And God said to David : "Solomon thy son, he shall build my house and my courts, for I have chosen him to be my son, and I will be his Father." (I. Chron. 28 : 6.) Yet the grace of God could not excuse Solomon from responsibility. It rendered him all the more responsible, for "to whom much is given, of him shall much be required." God is much more exact with those who have great opportunities for usefulness than with any other. A Moses who had twice spent forty days alone with God, face to face, and who was called to be the leader of the people of the Lord, could not be excused an act of unbelief, and an outbreak of temper. Solomon had been permitted privileges which were not allowed to David his father—he was a man of peace, he was permitted to build the temple of the Lord. But Solomon's prosperity was a greater test to him than his father's adversity had been to him. Nothing is so dangerous or so great a test to human nature as ease, success, and fame. Let us not think it is accidental when something occurs to thwart us,—the hand of our God is in all that happens. Earthly things exist only to "work together" for the education of God's children, they are only which must come down when the work is accomplished. Grievous and disastrous as it was, Israel must be divided rather than Solomon's pride go unrebuked. We may not, with our narrow sight, understand God's divine economy. But what we know not now we shall know hereafter. God promised Solomon that the kingdom should not be divided in his days, but in his son's days. Yet, in the end of his reign, this greatest and most glorious of earthly kings had the mortification of seeing enemies rising up against him, his popularity declining, and his son unsatisfactory, everything to humble him and make him feel the transitoriness of all earthly glory and distinction, so that he who had put to the test all the resources of earth to satisfy, was impelled to come to the sad conclusion, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

Rehoboam's coronation was a success, there was a large and universal gathering of the people to Shechem, to make him king. But dangerous elements were at work in the kingdom, and through them the purposes of God would be carried out. There was a party which despised the weak son of the mighty Solomon, and they were set upon a revolution which should place the government in the hands of the more manly and capable Jeroboam. They sent and fetched him from his exile in Egypt. They must find some pretext for a political movement, and they make it take the form of a petition to the king headed by Jeroboam, "Thy father made our yoke grievous," they said, "now, therefore, make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us lighter, and we will serve thee." Rehoboam did wisely in taking three days to consider the matter that he might take counsel. But there was One whose Counsel he Sought Not, the God of his grandfather David, and no other counsel could stand when his was ignored. He counselled with the old men who had stood before his father, and they answered, "If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever." It was good and wise counsel, but there was nothing in it to flatter the pride of a vain young man. "A servant indeed! I mean to let them know I am their master." Such is the heartless spirit which turns good servants into bitter enemies, and good workmen into dissatisfied strikers. "By love serve one another" is the Gospel rule which applies as much to masters as to men, to mistresses as to servants.

Rehoboam, instead of acting on this wise advice, called around him the company of silly flatterers who had grown up with him, and who had been what those young men are who hang on to a rich friend, and make the most they can out of him. Of course their advice was apart from all other considerations than how to maintain their parasitical hold on the young prince. They knew well how conceited he was; to them the loss of the kingdom was nothing, but the loss of a seat at his table, in his carriage, was everything. They advised him to give answer, "My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins." It was a vulgar, heartless, senseless boast, and Rehoboam had to pay dear for it.

The Insurrection.

The insurrection was ripe; the people only waited for the king's decision, and while he yet gave them audience it broke out, and they replied to the boasting young king who had insulted them, "What portion have we in David, and neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel, now look to thine own house, David." Rehoboam made a feeble effort to collect the taxes, but his emissary was stoned, and Jeroboam was made king by mutual consent of all the tribes but Judah and Benjamin. "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." It was time that Rehoboam should know and find his level. He attempted to gather his army, and fight for his rights. But another appeared on the scene, and God sent a prophet to tell him that this thing was of him. And this was love on the part of God. How much more of love is there in God's rebukes than in man's flatteries? God shows us ourselves and others in a real light. Rehoboam in his misfortune was, no doubt, a really happier man than when surrounded with his creatures, he imagined himself to be a man of power and influence. He learned his lesson, and his reign was not altogether devoid of wisdom; he learned and made the most of what remained to him, and encouraged the priests and scribes to settle in his land, when Jeroboam encouraged idolatry in Israel. Thus God overrules. He made even the division which was so humbling in itself a blessing to Rehoboam and his people just in measure as they submitted to him under it. And thus will it always be in every circumstance of trial. The recognition of God lets in the sunshine and so he brings good out of evil as far as the waywardness of man will let him.

A WORD WITH HOUSE-KEEPERS.

WHILE in the regular harness of city life the sitting-room is so far from the kitchen that we have not much understanding of its toils and perplexities, we have not much to say save when there has been an accident, and the pudding comes in burned or the coffee has not been settled. But house-keeping sometimes in the country, and during vacation, we have more time to consider; and we wander into the culinary department to see when dinner will be ready. We then bethink ourselves of the grace necessary for the kitchen.

First: There is the grace for managing a balky stove. You, being in the hardware business and interested in certain patents, may begin to rattle over the names of stoves which never flinch, which do things brown at the right moment, which never take up the habits of our human race and begin to smoke, and never let the fire go out. But we do not believe you. Stoves belong to a fallen race, and the best of them sometimes prove tricky. Sometimes they fly into a hot temper and burn things up, and sometimes they will pout for half an hour because a green chip or unseasoned stick of wood is thrown at them. The best dispositioned stove will sometimes refuse to broil, or stew, or bake, or frizzle. You coax it in every possible way. You reason with it and tell it how important it is that it do its duty, for company has come, or a departing guest must meet the train, or you are too tired to bother any longer, and all it does in reply is to sputter. Here is a place for Christian sympathy and help. For lack of this Martha of Bethany acted precipitately, and many a good woman has lost her equilibrium.

Secondly: There is a grace needed for the pantry. Somehow cups and glasses and cake-baskets will get broken, and no one has done it. Knives will disappear, and no one has taken them. An old saucer that was given to your grandmother the day of her marriage is cracked and set back on the shelf as though it had been uninjured. The tea-caddy has been despoiled, or flour unreasonably failed, with no miracle, as in Zarephath, to replenish it. There are but few women who can keep their temper when their best china set gets broken. To study economy for a month, and to find the result of this unusual carefulness has leaked out at some mysterious spigot; to have a whole mess of milk soured by one thunderstorm; to have the washboiler boil over and put out the fire; to have the dessert only half done when the people at dinner are waiting, wondering whether it is to be sago pudding or Narcissus blanch-mange; to have the servant make up her mind she don't like the place, and leave the house in the midst of the ironing; to have to provide elaborate entertainment for some one whom you asked to come to your house without any idea she would accept the invitation; to find after the quinces are all peeled and cut that the brass kettle has been borrowed—all this demands grace for the kitchen.

We masculines have yet to learn that the kitchen is the most important end of the household. If that go wrong the whole establishment is wrong. It decides the health of the household, and health settles almost everything. Heavy bread, too great frequency of plum-pudding, mingling of lemonade and custards, unmanageable beef, have decided the fate of sermons, storehouses, legislative bills, and the destiny of empires. What if Bismarck had been seized with a long fit of indigestion about the time of the breaking out of the last French and German war? What if, when Plimsoll was trying to raise an insurrection among the sailors of Great Britain, Disraeli should have been overcome of the gout? The kitchen knife has often cut off the brightest prospects. The kitchen gridiron has often consumed a commercial enterprise. The kitchen kettle has kept many a good man in hot water. It will never be fully known how much the history of the world was affected by good or bad cookery.

Let no housekeeper therefore, despise her occupation, but rather pray for grace to fulfil her mission. The toils and fatigues and vexations of such a sphere may be unappreciated by husbands and fathers and mothers, but God knows and sympathizes. If according to the Bible, God puts into a bottle his people's tears, he will count the number of sweat drops on your forehead while bending over the stove. By the potential way in which you perform your duties you may make the rolling-pin a sceptre. Be faithful! There will be a grand supper after a while for the preparation of which you will have no anxiety. It will be the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, and you will be one of the banqueters.

One of the most affecting reminiscences of my mother is my remembrance of her as a Christian housekeeper. She worked very hard and when we would come in from summer play, and sit down at the table at noon, I remember how she used to come in with beads of perspiration along the line of gray hair, and how sometimes she would sit down at the table, and put her head against her wrinkled hand and say: "Well, the fact is, I'm too tired to eat." Long after she might have delegated this duty to others, she would not be satisfied unless she attended to the matter herself. In fact, we all preferred to have her do so, for somehow things tasted better when she prepared them. Some time ago, in an express train, I shot past that old homestead. I looked out of the window, and tried to peer through the darkness. While I was doing so, one of my old school-mates, whom I had not seen for many years, tapped me on the shoulder and said: "De Witt, I see you are looking out at the scene of your boyhood." "O yes," I replied, "I was looking out at the old place where my mother lived and died." That night, in the cars, the whole scene came back to me. There was the country home. There was the noonday table. There were the children on either side of the table—most of them gone never to come back. At one end of the table, my father, with a smile that never left his countenance even when he lay in his coffin. It was an eighty-six years, smile—not the smile of inanition, but of Christian courage and Christian hope. At the other end of the table was a beautiful, benignant, hard-working, aged Christian housekeeper, my mother. She was very tired. I am glad she has so good a place to rest in. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

THE editor of this journal wishes it understood that the article in last week's number entitled "Recruits for the Pulpit," and ascribed to him by mistake was not of his authorship, but a quoted article.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Francis Edward Smiley has been holding evangelistic services in Jamesburg, N. J., with excellent results.

Mr. Trow Ahok, a prosperous merchant of Foo Chow, has just given $10,000 to found an Anglo-Chinese college in that city.

The receipts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for November were $24,179, against $39,800 for the same month last year.

A letter has been received from Rev. W. L. Whipple announcing his safe arrival at Tiflis, whence he will proceed by caravan to Tabreez, thirteen hundred miles away.

The New York City Mission Society has now charge of three English Churches, two German and one Italian Church. A Chinese Sunday School has also been added during the year.

Father Ignatius, the English monk of the Protestant Episcopal Church has been conducting religious services in this city for the past week. Large crowds have attended his services.

The receipts of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church for the months ending the first of November, amount to $200,194, a gain of $66,785 over the receipts for the same period of the previous year.

At the Grand Ligne Mission, near Montreal, there are now thirteen Protestant Missionaries and teachers. Five missionaries are supported for $1,200 a year. A new wing has recently been added to the buildings at the cost of $25,000.

The total population of the United States according to the census, counting 315,000 Indians and whites in the Indian Territory, and the estimated population of 38,000 in Alaska Territory, is 63,000,000 in round numbers, which shows a numerical gain of 13,000,000 in the last decade.

Evangelist E. W. Bliss is holding meetings at Rock Island, Ill. The Argus of that town says that they are crowded and the whole neighborhood is stirred. The Central Presbyterian Church in which the meetings are held is crowded daily, and large numbers throng the inquiry room.

The International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, has issued again this year its valuable little work which in past years has been found helpful to pastors. It contains a list of topics for prayer meetings for the year with suitable Scripture readings. It may be obtained by sending five cents to Mr. Richard C. Morse, 40 East Twenty-third street, New York.

The results of God's blessing on the work of the Rev. B. Fay Mills at Plainfield, N. J., were seen on Sunday, December 14, when eighty-six new members were received on profession of faith into the Trinity Reformed Church, forty into the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church, twenty-two into the First Baptist Church, and many others into other churches. Mr. Mills' subsequent work at Syracuse, N. Y., has been similarly blessed.

A valuable acquisition to the resources of the New York Young Women's Christian Association, will soon be in operation. It will be a temporary home for young women who come as strangers to the city. It is an elegant building well furnished throughout with baths etc., a restaurant in the basement and a laundry on one floor. It is the gift of Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard, who has defrayed the entire cost of building and furnishing. It is to be called the Margaret Louisa Home, so named after Mrs. Shepard's two daughters. The gift will supply a want that the Y. W. C. A. has long felt.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Death of Sitting Bull—Fighting in the Bad Lands—The Irish Faction War—A Great Woman Philanthropist Gone—The Hero of Fort Fisher—The Money Stringency—A Great December Storm, etc.

The Death of Sitting Bull, the Famous Sioux chief, removes the prime cause of the recent disturbances among the Indians in the Northwest. It had been discovered that he had planned a general Indian war for next Spring, and had sent couriers to all the tribes, even to Canada. Events hastened the crisis sooner than was expected, and the wily chief decided to begin the war at once. Indian police were sent to his camp forty miles from Standing Rock with orders to arrest him. A sharp fight followed in which Bull, his son Black Bird, and several of his warriors, as well as seven policemen, were killed. The dead chief was one of the worst Indians in a generation. From his boyhood he was a malcontent. He was born in Dakota in 1837, was concerned in the Minnesota massacre of 1862, and soon after set up as a tribal leader of the Sioux, frequently attacking his own people when his supremacy was threatened. In 1876, his Sioux warriors, twenty-five hundred strong, slaughtered General Custer's brave little force of four hundred infantry and a handful of cavalry at the Little Big Horn River. Bull afterwards escaping to British Dominion. Since then he has been constantly fomenting trouble, although of late years his influence has declined. A portrait of the renowned chief is given in this column. The remnant of his band has been reinforced and is now in the Bad Lands, 1,000 strong, and resolved to avenge his death. General Miles is preparing to advance against them.

Factional Warfare and Dire Confusion Have characterized the situation in Ireland during the week. Parnell and his political foes have each taken the stump and wherever the former goes the latter are found closely on his heels. Killenny has been the scene of a series of campaign disturbances. One township, Ballynahill, had a Parnell and an anti-Parnell meeting simultaneously progressing, when the rival factions rushed at each other furiously. On the side of the anti-Parnellites were several priests who are said to have fought as sturdily, with stick and fist, as any man on the ground. Parnell occupied a stand not far from Michael Davitt, and in the course of his remarks called Davitt a "jack-daw." The latter leaped from the platform and with the aid of a hazel stick, amid blows and clubbings, fought his way to Parnell, whom he roundly denounced, and called his followers blackguards. In the melee a number were more or less injured. Later on the same day both factions met at Castle Comer, where a row ensued. Stones and mud filled the air and there was a perfect forest of blackthorn shillelahs in sight, all the leaders having cudgels. Several bags with lime were flung, and a mass of lime struck Mr. Parnell full in the face, completely blinding him. He almost fainted with the intense pain. It was feared for a time that he might lose his eyesight. He has since attended several meetings, leaning, blind-like, on the arms of friends.

Since the Days When the Old Spanish Galleons sailed across the seas, laden with gold and silver treasure, few vessels have come over the Atlantic with a richer cargo than that carried by the steamship Majestic, which reached New York on Thursday, the 18th, with over two million dollars in gold in her hold. The metal was in five strong wooden boxes, and these were kept in an iron compartment, the door of which was sealed. When she was unloaded, the five boxes were hoisted by means of canvas slings and placed in a truck, where two armed guards sat beside the driver who took the treasure to the offices of different bankers in Wall Street. This was the first instalment of gold which, with others soon to follow, is expected to help turn the financial tide and relax the present stringency in the money market.

A Furious December Storm, Amounting in many places to a cyclone, raged throughout the Eastern States on Wednesday, the 17th. Three days earlier it had swept the territory between St. Louis and Chicago, and then took a northeasterly course, bringing with it torrents of rain and heavy snow. Along the Atlantic coast much damage was done by the violent wind. In New York harbor the shipping suffered; in the city itself hundreds of signs were torn down, and many trees uprooted. In Brooklyn, portions of three unfinished buildings were levelled to the ground. In New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Tennessee, and adjoining States, heavy snowfalls occurred, the heaviest being in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, which city was almost snowed under, local travel being temporarily stopped. The gale blew down the White House flagstaff in Washington, and a portion of the roof of the Pension Office was torn off. Altogether it was the windiest December gale in several years. Fortunately no loss of life is reported.

Signor Succi, the Italian, Completed his forty-five days' fast on Saturday, December 21st, when he indulged in the luxury of a solid repast. His vitality has astonished the physicians. Little doubt is expressed concerning the genuineness of the fast, for the man was closely watched by relays of reputable physicians. He was sustained by an elixir of his own compounding which he keeps a secret. This condensed nutriment, together with ice-water and seltzer, was all that passed the Italian's lips during the six and a-half weeks of his fast. A portrait of Succi has already appeared in these columns.

The Hero of Fort Fisher, Major-General Alfred Howe Terry, whose brilliant assault, aided by Commodore Porter's fleet, carried that stronghold in January, 1864, expired at his home, in New Haven, Ct., of heart disease, on the 16th inst. General Terry was educated for the law, but joined the army when the war began, serving with Sherman, and being on the field at Bull Run, Fort Pulaski, Drewry's Bluff, Bermuda Hundred, Deep Bottom, and also in the actions of Newmarket and the Williamsburgh road. He was made Brigadier-General in 1865 and Major-General in 1886. General Terry's sister is Rose Terry Cooke, the to succeed in any enterprise.

How to Relieve the Prevailing Monetary stringency is one of the questions now under consideration in Congress. A few days ago a number of Senators held a consultation with Secretary of the Treasury Windom, and Mr. Leech, the Director of the Mint. The Secretary approved the proposition to purchase the existing surplus of silver bullion now in this country as a positive means of enhancing the price of silver, and thus relieving the stringency. He also believed the compulsory holding of U. S. bonds by National banks should be reduced, and that two per cent. bonds should be issued. The Senate Sub-Committee in charge of the measure will report a bill favoring the purchase of the $12,000,000 surplus of silver at the rate of $3,000,000 a month, and the purchase of silver bullion to make good, by means of treasury notes, the deficiency in the National bank circulation when it falls below $180,000. The President is said to be satisfied that these measures will prove sufficient.

One of the Kindest and Best of Women Philanthropists, the Countess of Rosebery, died in England lately of typhoid fever. Hannah de Rothschild was the only child of the late Baron Meyer Amschel de Rothschild, and when she married the Earl of Rosebery in 1878, she brought him a great fortune. The wedding was one of the grandest social events ever witnessed in London. The Prince of Wales and other royalties attended, and the Earl of Beaconsfield gave away the bride. The Countess' whole life was devoted to doing good. She was a "Lady Bountiful" indeed to the poor of a very large district, and her charities became almost a household word throughout England. She took an active part in the promotion of the Women's Industries Section at the Edinburgh Exposition and was a leading organizer in over a score of charitable associations. The poor Hebrews of the East End of London, especially, will miss her, for she was more than kind to many families and stood between them and starvation. In every movement for the amelioration of the distressed throughout the kingdom she was to be found actively working at all seasons of the year, denying herself many pleasures usually enjoyed exclusively by the class to which she belonged, for the sake of the good work she loved so well. A portrait of the Countess is given in this column.

One of the Oldest of New York's many Sacred edifices, Christ Church, on Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, was destroyed by fire on the afternoon of the 17th. No services had been held there since May, and the congregation had moved to their new building farther up town. The church was situated almost opposite the St. Nicholas Club, which, by a strange coincidence, caught fire the same afternoon and sustained considerable damage. The owner of the church, Lewis Samuels, three weeks ago advertised it for sale and J. D. Bentley, an artist, put his famous painting of "The Ideal Head of Christ" on exhibition there temporarily. The picture, which was valued at $50,000, was consumed in the flames. The loss on the church building, about $60,000, falls on the congregation.

A Trainload of Canadians, Homeward Bound for the holidays, met a frightful mishap on the Intercolonial Railway at St. Joseph de Levis, on the 18th inst. There were two hundred passengers on board, and the train was going at the highest rate of speed, when the express car left the track and in an instant the entire train followed down a twenty-five-foot embankment. Five passengers were taken out dead.

American Physicians, Just Returned from Berlin, speak enthusiastically of the cures accomplished by Professor Koch's lymph, under their own personal observation. One New York physician alone brought back with him enough of the liquid to inoculate 5,000 persons. Three others are known to have it in much smaller quantities. Almost fabulous prices are offered for it, and the craze threatens to become very general, among those affected with tuberculosis or lupus. The returning doctors report that Koch is now experimenting in the Berlin hospitals for lymphs that will cure diphtheria, scarlet-fever, small-pox, and leprosy, and that he has stopped his investigations of the tuberculosis lymph, convinced of its efficacy.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Declaration of Experience—I. The Qualifications of a Teacher—Should Know His Subject—The Conversion of a German Preacher—Mr. Haslam's Experience—Firm Conviction Necessary—Good-will to Hearers—II. The Argument for the Hearer—A Personal Testimony to Fundamental Truths—Sin is a Bitter Thing—The New Birth Genuine—Prayer is Heard—The Power in the Gospel—III. An Exhortation to the Inquirer.

"Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good." Job 5: 27.

THUS closed a forcible speech by Eliphaz, the Temanite: it may be called his "summing up." He virtually says, "What I have testified in the name of my friends is no dream of theirs. Upon this matter we are specialists; and bear witness to truth which we have made the subject of research and experience. "Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good." By this declaration he sets forth his teaching with authority, and presses it home. He persuades Job to consider what he had said, for it was no hasty opinion, but the ripe fruit of experience. When we speak what we know we expect to be heard. I shall not follow Eliphaz: I am only going to borrow his closing words, and use them in reference to Gospel testimony; which is to us a thing known and searched out.

I. These words may well describe

The Qualification of the Teacher.

He will be poorly furnished if he cannot run in the line which Eliphaz draws in the words of our text. He should have, first, an intimate knowledge of his subject. How can he teach what he does not know? When we come to talk about God, and the soul, and sin, and the precious blood of Jesus, and the new birth, and holiness, and eternal life, the speaker who knows nothing about these things personally must be a poor driveller. Without personal experience you will speak riddles of which you do not know the answers. The blind will lead the blind, and both will fall into the ditch. There is a German story of a minister who had delivered himself very earnestly upon a vital theme, and after the service he was waited upon by one in great distress of heart, who was peculiar in his use of language. He generally said "we" when he should have said "I;" and so he said to the minister, "Sir, if what you have been saying is true, what shall we do?" He did not mean to bring the minister into it, but the use of the word "we" implicated the pastor so much that he began to search, and searching, he found that he had no part nor lot in the matter, and that he had been preaching what he himself had never felt.

Have I anybody here who is doing this every Sabbath day? A blind man, who is teaching others about color and vision? A preacher of an unknown God? A dead man sent with messages of life? You are in

dear friend. The Lord save you! I wish that it might happen to you as it did to my dear friend, Mr. Haslam, whom God has blessed to the conversion of so many. He was preaching a sermon which he did not understand, and while he preached it, he converted himself. By God's grace he began to feel the power of the Holy Spirit and the force of divine truth. He so spoke that a Methodist in the congregation presently cried out, "The parson is converted;" and so the parson was. He owned it, and praised God for it, and all the people sang—

Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.

His own utterances concerning Christ crucified had been to him the power of God unto salvation. O beloved, no man has any right to teach in the Sunday School, or preach, or pretend in any other way to be sent of God, unless he has been so taught of the Holy Spirit that he has an intimate acquaintance with the Gospel.

It strikes me, next, that what is wanted in a successful teacher is a firm conviction of the truth of these things, growing out of his having tested them for himself. He must say, with emphasis, "So it is." When I had found Christ, and joined the church, I began to teach in the Sabbath School, but my class of boys taught me more than I taught them. I was speaking to them one day about "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," and one of the boys said to me, "Teacher, have you believed?" I answered, "Yes." "And have you been baptized?" "Yes." "Then," said he, "teacher, you are saved." I said, "I hope so." Years ago it was a kind of fashion to say "I hope so;" and I followed my seniors in this modest talk. The boy looked me straight in the face, and said, "And don't you know, teacher?" Well, I felt that I did know, and that I ought not to have said "I hope so." So I replied, "Yes, I do know it." "Of course," said the boy, "the text says so. If it ain't true, well, of course, it ain't true; but if it is true, well, it is true, and nobody need hope about it." So it was. The boy used

Good Logic.

The Scripture saith, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" therefore, he that believeth and is baptized is saved. The Lord's Word must be true. Why do you "hope" about it? Believe it and enjoy it. But people will go hoping and hoping, and hopping and limping; as if to be lame were the proper thing. They had better put both feet to the ground, and cry, "God has said it: I believe it. Glory be to his name, he shall have all the praise." "Then shall the lame man leap as an hart." When we teach others, we ought to have a firm conviction that what we teach is true beyond question.

Once more: a needful qualification for a teacher of the Word is earnestness and good-will to the hearer. We must implore each one of our hearers to give earnest heed. We must cry to him with our whole heart, "Hear it, and know thou it for thy good." Without love, there can be no real eloquence. A preacher had managed somehow to offend one of his hearers, and the angry man kept away from the place of worship for many a day. The preacher was not in the least aware that but when the matter came out, he went at once to set it right. The offended person had become settled in unbelief. The preacher went to him, and said that he had been sorry to miss him; and that he had been made ill by learning that he had become an unbeliever. Tears were in his eyes, and his voice was half choked, as he said, "Do you know, friend David, I cannot sleep at nights for thinking about you? I am so concerned about your soul that I cannot rest unless you are converted." The man had grown into the habit of blasphemy, and if he had been addressed in any other way he would have cursed the minister, and told him to go about his business; but that touch of real affection did it. "You concerned about my soul! Then it is time that I became concerned about it too:" that was the reasoning which passed through David's mind. Oh, let us love our hearers! Let us love them to Jesus.

II. Secondly,

The Argument for the Hearer:—

"Lo this, we have searched it, so it is." The argument directed to the hearer is the experience of many, confirming the statement of one: "We have searched it, so it is." Bacon has taught us from a mass of agreeing testimonies to infer a general truth. We are not now so selfish as to set up a theory, and then hunt for facts to support it; but we gather the facts first, and then deduce the theory from them. So here the three friends have made ample researches, and have arrived at certain conclusions; and they urge this reasoning upon Job. Without further preface I should like to bear my own personal witness to a few things about which I am fully persuaded. I am not afraid of dogmatism, but I shall speak very positively, since I can say, "Lo this, we have searched it, so it is."

And my first witness is that sin is an evil and a bitter thing. We know of ourselves, and in ourselves, that sin is a serpent, whose teeth in-fuses poison into the wound it makes. Sin brought some of us very low, and nothing but almighty grace restored us. We get neither pleasure nor profit by sin, though it may dupe us with the name of both. Sin is "evil, only evil, and that continually." This we have searched, and so it is. We wish that others who are beginning life would accept our testimony, and withhold their feet from the paths of the destroyer. It cannot be needful that everybody should taste the poison cup: may not our mournful experience of sin's evil effects suffice for you? Sirs, you may search the purlieus of sin, from end to end, but you will never find a living joy therein. Wherefore, flee from it, by God's grace.

I wish next to testify to the fact that repentance of sin, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, bring a wonderful rest to the heart, and work a marvellous change in the whole life and character. There is such a thing as the new birth, for we have been born again; and this not in mere fancy or sentiment, but as a plain matter of fact. I speak for thousands in this place to-night when I say that repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ bestow on men a wonderful delight, and transform their characters by the Holy Ghost. That is worth knowing, is it not? Believe for yourselves, and realize personally the power of faith. "We have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good."

A Test of Prayer.

Next, we beg to bear our witness to the fact that prayer is heard of God. If it were possible for me to tell you the many instances in which God has heard my prayers, you would, in your kindness, follow me a considerable way, but I should have to draw so largely upon your faith, that before I came to the end, you would feel compelled to doubt. Nor should I blame you. Truth is stranger than fiction, and if you are not familiar with prayer, you would think me a mad fanatic. In matters in reference to the Stockwell Orphanage, I have seen the Lord's hand very conspicuously in times of need. When money has run short, and there have been hundreds of children to be fed, faith and prayer have filled our coffers. Well, sir, men of the world may say it is all fancy, and laugh at it as a spiritual dream; but fancies do not load tables, and feed children, and supply thousands of pounds. Will one of you make the attempt? Will you provide for our five hundred orphans for a month by dreams and fancies? We have known times of close pinching, and have waited upon God, and in a short time he has sent us abundant relief, whereof there are brethren on this platform who would willingly bear witness.

An Attack on the Preacher.

I wish that anybody here who is in doubt about it would try the power of prayer. Go to God in prayer—ay, even you that are unconverted—and see whether the Lord will not hear you. Somebody says, "Surely that is unsound advice! How can the unconverted pray?" Let me tell you a story. I was preaching, years ago, to the Sunday School children of a certain country town, where the people were Calvinistic, and a point or two more. They received sixteen ounces to the pound of the Gospel, and they liked an ounce or two above full weight. I made the observation to the children that before I had been renewed by grace, I, as a child, was in trouble, and I went to God in supplication, and he helped me. I need not repeat the circumstances; but it seemed to me that the Lord heard my childish pleading, and helped me.

When I came out from the chapel, where I had mentioned this circumstance, a number of grave persons who were both sound and sour in the faith, beset me round about like bees. They began asking, "How can a natural man pray a spiritual prayer? How can God accept a prayer which is merely natural, since he is a Spirit? If prayer is not wrought by the Holy Ghost it is an idle form"; and so on, and so on. It is difficult to conceive how many quibbles can be made upon one point. I was about twenty years of age, but I did my best to defend my-for I had stated a fact, and a fact is a stubborn thing. At any rate, I held my own; but I did not know that I should have won the victory if I had been left alone. A grand old woman in a black cloak pressed forward into the middle of the throng, and addressed the doubly-sound-breathed whom she knew better than I did. With an almost prophetic air she looked on them and said, "O fools and slow of heart to come here and cavil with this young servant of the Lord. Harken to me, and be convinced, and go home in silence. Does not the Lord hear the young men when they cry? Do they pray spiritual prayers? Does the Holy Ghost work prayer in them? If God hears the natural prayers of young ravens, will he not hear the cries of children?" This was fine. The adversaries vanished out of my sight.

The Reward of Service.

Another testimony we would like to bear, namely, that obedience to the Lord, though it may involve present loss, is sure to be the most profitable course for the believing man to take. You will serve the Lord Jesus Christ, you will find your road all smooth; but you will find it more pleasant than serving the devil. Satan said of Job, "Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about all that he hath?" It was most true, but the Lord God might have answered the devil, "Would you have my servants unrewarded? Is from you that service meets no reward but death. Do you think I would have you able to do? God's servants serve him for nothing. When Job gets no return for his faithful obedience?" Beloved, we may not expect immediate success in business because we walk in the path of integrity. We may for a time be losers by being honest, and may miss many a chance by abhorring deception. But we do not measure things by the inch and by the ounce, when we come to deal with eternal matters.

Power in the Old Gospel.

I have many things to say, but our hours are like the cherubim: each one hath six wings. We beg to say that the old-fashioned Gospel is able to save men, and to arouse enthusiasm in their souls. Here—here is the best proof! Look around upon this vast assembly. Have we any music, any candles, any millinery? Have we anything here to attract people but simply the preaching of the old, old Gospel? Our service is so severely simple as to be called bare. Have I not kept to the Gospel, and set it forth in simple language? Lo, here I come to the end of thirty-seven years, and before me are the same multitudes of people as at the first. Young preacher, you will not need anything but Christ Jesus, should you be spared to preach as long as I have done.

III. I close now with our third point: we have here the exhortation

To the Inquirer.

What do we say to him? "This, we have searched it, so it is, hear it." Life is a poor thing if it ends here. Do you believe that all you can possess is to be had on this side of the grave? It is a poor look out. Do you fancy that your life can be nothing better than an endless turning of the grindstone? Were you born merely to toil for daily bread? Is there nothing higher and better? If you say that you will die like dogs, I dare not think so meanly of you as you think of yourselves. You have only begun to exist. You have to live forever. You will exist in eternity as surely as God shall live, world without end. Shall it be an immortality of happiness, or an eternal existence of woe? Do, I pray you, think about this: and if there be a Gospel (and you believe there is,) then hear it, hear it, hear it, till by the hearing of it God sends you faith, and faith grasps salvation!

The next thing that he says is "know it." Our text means—know it in a particular way. "Know thou it for thy good." The devil knows a great deal. He knows more than the most intelligent of us; but he knows nothing for his good. All that he knows sours into evil within his rebellious nature. You may have all the knowledge of Solomon, and yet you may know nothing for your good, but end your days with the terrible wailing, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity."

How is a man to know anything for his good? This knowledge must first be a practical knowledge. Does the Word say "Repent?" If you want to know what repentance means, repent at once. You need not go to the Catechism or to the Creed for a definition; repent, and you know what repentance means. Be changed in mind, confess your sin, and forsake it. Be sorry for sin; see the wrong of it; quit it. You will know what repentance is when you have repented. If you want to know believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and when you have believed, you will know what believing is. The best way to know a virtue is to practise it. We get confounding and confusing ourselves with trivial distinctions, whereas we had better throw distinctions to the dogs, and get to soul-winning. You will never catch hares with drums, nor souls with controversies. Come to Jesus, sinner! Come to Jesus! believe in Jesus at once! "He that doeth his will shall know of the doctrine."

What Faith Is,

Now I have done; but I should like to say this: If there is nothing in religion, why do you come here? If there is salvation in believing in Christ, why are you not saved? You say there is a hell. Why are you going there? You know that there is a heaven. Why are you not preparing for it? You know that there is a Christ, whose wounds bleed salvation; why are you not looking to him?

Is it all to be Play, this religion of ours—going to meetings, sitting in your seats, and listening to the preacher? I would rather be silent than be fiddling to your dancing; or go through the service merely to spend a Sabbath in a decorous manner. Sirs, if you are not saved, what shall I do? What shall I do? If you are saved, we will meet in heaven, and we will praise God for ever, each one of us, and our Lord shall have all the glory. But if you are lost—if you are lost—I cannot come to you, nor can you come to me. Let me do what I can for you before the great gulf divides us. O souls, why will you die? Why will you keep on procrastinating and crying "To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow?" Why should it always be to-morrow? Trust yourselves to Jesus now. By that dreadful doom which will surely fall on every man who dies rejecting Christ, I beseech you flee from the wrath to come. Lord, grant that it may be so, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

John Quincy Adams in a Ditch.*

THE following is an anecdote that John Quincy Adams loved to tell: "When I was a boy, the study of Latin was dull and irksome. Going to my father one day, I told him I did not like study, and asked for some other employment. 'Well, John,' said he, 'if Latin grammar does not suit, you can try ditching. My meadow yonder needs a ditch.' To the meadow I went, but soon found ditching harder than Latin. The first forenoon was the longest I ever spent, and I was glad when night came. I worked the next forenoon and wanted to return to Latin at dinner. At night, toil conquered pride, and I told my father, if he chose, I would go back to Latin grammar. He was glad of it, and if I have gained any distinction, it has been owing to those two days' labor in that abominable ditch."

Alexander Hamilton's Death.

After the duel with Aaron Burr the Rev. J. M. Mason had an interview with Mr. Hamilton, which he thus describes: "On Wednesday morning, shortly after the rumor of the General's injury had created an alarm in the city, a note from Dr. Post informed me that he was

Giddings, comprising sketches in American history, of men of Christian faith and experience, who have had connection with the National and State Governments and the judicial department; embracing Colonial, Revolutionary and later periods; alphabetically arranged, with chronological index of early State Governors; with numerous portraits. extremely ill at Mr. William Bayard's, and expressed a particular desire to see me as soon as possible. I went immediately. . . . I reminded the General that he was not to be instructed as to the moral aspect of the duel; that the blood of Christ was as effectual and as necessary to wash away the transgression which had involved him, as any other transgression; and that he must then seek peace for his conscience. He assented with strong emotion and declared his abhorrence of that whole transaction. "It was always," said he, "against my principles. I used every expedient to avoid the interview; but I have found for some time past that my life must be exposed to that man. I went to the field determined not to take his life." He repeated his disavowal of all intention to hurt Mr. Burr, and his humble hope of forgiveness from his God. I recurred to the topic of the divine compassion, and the freedom of pardon in the Redeemer. "That grace, my dear General, which brings salvation is rich, rich!" "Yes," interrupted he, "it is rich grace!" "And on that grace," continued I, "the sinner has the highest encouragement to repose his confidence." Here the General, letting go my hand, which he had held from the moment I had sat down by his bed-side, clasped his hands together, and, looking up toward heaven, said with emphasis, "I have a tender reliance on the mercy of the Almighty through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ."

President Lincoln's Inquiry.

During the war, a lady connected with the Christian Commission had occasion, in the course of her duties, to have several interviews with the President. On one occasion, after business was finished, he said to her: "Mrs.—— I have formed a high opinion of your Christian character, and now I have a mind to ask you to give me, in brief, your idea of what constitutes a true religious experience." The lady stated that, in her judgment, it consisted of a conviction of one's own sinfulness and weakness, and personal need of the Saviour for strength and support; that views of mere doctrine might, and would differ, but when one was really brought to feel his need of divine help, and to seek the aid of the Holy Spirit for strength and guidance, it was evidence of his having been born again. Mr. Lincoln was thoughtful for a few moments, and at length said: "If what you have told me is a correct view of this great subject, I think I can say that I hope I am a Christian. 'I had lived' he continued, "until my boy Willie died, without fully realizing these things. That blow overwhelmed me. It showed me weakness as I had never felt it before, and if I can take what you have stated as a test, I think I can safely say that I know something of the great change of which you speak; and I will further add, that it has been my intention for some time, at a suitable opportunity to make a public religious profession."

Chief Justice Parsons.

Mr. Theophilus Parsons tells this incident of his father, who was Chief Justice of Massachusetts from 1806 to 1813: "An eminent merchant of Boston told me that he once had a very important question, in which foreign correspondents were interested to a very large amount, and upon which he needed immediate advice, and he determined to ride to Newburyport to see my father, whom he always consulted. He rode there on Sunday, changing horses at Ipswich, that he might return at night, as he must act on Monday upon the advice he received. He found my father in his study, and began to state his case. 'Stop there,' said my father, 'I will not hear another word to-day. But I must go back to Boston to-night.' 'Very good, you can go and get the advice of some one else, I will not attend to business on Sunday. The merchant pressed and urged him, but to no purpose, until my father said: 'This much I will say to you without knowing your case, or charging a fee: Do you want to know about the law of it, or the justice of it?' 'About the law of it only; for the moral right and wrong are plain enough.' 'Then,' said my father, 'I will answer you thus: if you will take upon yourself the responsibility of deciding what course is just and right, I will take the responsibility of holding that course to be the legal one.' The merchant retired, acted upon his counsel, and found himself in the right."

A Sentence of Death.

The following remarks were made by the famous Jacob Rush, Chief Justice of Pennsylvania in passing a sentence of death on a convict murderer: "As you have but a short time to live in this world, and there is no hope of pardon from any earthly hand, let me urge you to seek pardon from above. It is the consolation of the wretched and the guilty that God is infinitely merciful. But it should be remembered that he is merciful, not to him who continues in the practice of sin, but to him only who repents of it and utterly forsakes it. Be assured that the question is not, whether you must repent of your sins. That is certain, sooner or later. But the question is whether it is not better to repent in this world, where your repentance may be attended with the happiest results, than to repent hereafter. You have imbrued your hands in innocent blood, and though the water of the mountain washed the stain from your garments, and from your hands, yet oceans of water can never wash away the stain of guilt from your conscience. Nothing can do this but the efficacious and all-cleansing blood of the Saviour. . . . Let me earnestly advise and beseech you to send for some pious clergyman, and to converse freely with him. And who knows but through the blessing of God, you may be presented without spot or blemish, before the throne of the Lamb, and shine hereafter among the spirits of just men made perfect, in the realms of ineffable glory and felicity."

UNKNOWN TONQUIN.

Strange Scenes and Sightings Encountered by Explorers in the Indo-Chinese Peninsula.

EVEN in these days of railroads and telegraphs, there are still some corners of the earth about which very little is known to civilization. One of these districts is the territory in the upper part of the Indo-Chinese peninsula, the country of the Tonquinese. Tonquin is now, as China formerly was, practically a closed land against white exploration. It has only been with the greatest difficulty that the English and French have been able to open up even a small portion of the country to commerce, and much remains to be done before the barriers can be broken down that now conceal from the world the true character and history of this wild, picturesque and courageous people.

At the present time, several exploring parties are pushing their way through this unknown land, and the pictures we give on this page of

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are taken from drawings made by a member of one of these parties. They are interesting as disclosing a type distinct from the Mongol and Indian, and yet possessing many of the peculiarities of both. The explorers find great difficulty in pushing their way through the almost impenetrable forests in which the tropical grasses are often as high as the backs of their elephants. Tigers and wild elephants abound, and in the marshes and along the rivers are many crocodiles. These wild people—the Moi, the Stieng, the Kouys, the Benong, the Rhodi, and other tribes, have generally curly hair, skins varying from light to dark-brown, well-shaped noses and lips, and horizontal eyes. Even in the larger towns or settlements, the people are wholly ignorant, they know nothing of the outer world, cannot read or write, live from day to day, work only when they are compelled to, and support themselves principally by hunting and by raising a species of half-wild potatoes, and of few simple cereals and herbs. Like all wild people, they are inordinately fond of ornaments. The picture of a Tonquinese woman on this page shows the fashion in ear-rings, those worn being in the shape of a cup, which, in all probability, is utilized for drinking purposes when occasion demands. The illustration of the girl-weaver shows the primitive method of making cloth, which is used only as a hip covering. The cottages—of which half a dozen form a village—are made of bamboo and thatched with seaweed. They are large enough to allow a whole village to assemble within.

One of the saddest features of this wild life is the constant kidnapping that is going on among the natives, who are periodically raided and their women stolen by Chinese brigands and sold into slavery. The freebooters suddenly appear in a peaceful village, seize the women and drag them to the mountains, where they are sold to Chinese merchants who take them to China and put them on the slave market—a horrible custom sanctioned by the laws of the Flowery Kingdom, but which must, sooner or later, yield before the advance of Christianity and civilization.

THE GIRL QUEEN OF HOLLAND.

(See Illustration.)

THE death of the king of Holland, as reported recently in our news columns, leaves the throne of that kingdom to his young daughter, the Princess Wilhelmina Helena Pauline Marie, whose picture, representing her by the side of her little pony, appears on the next page. She is now a little over ten years of age, having been born August 31, 1880. With the exception of the king of Spain, who is four years old, she is the youngest monarch in Europe. The late king, who was twice married, had two sons by his first marriage. The elder, however, emulating the vices of his father and even exceeding them, difficult as that must have been, paid the penalty of his dissipation by his death some ten years ago. The younger, who was a weak-minded recluse, died soon afterward. Their mother, having died in 1877, the king married again in 1879. He was then sixty years of age, and his bride was only twenty. She was the Princess Emma, of Waldeck-Pyrmont, whose sister married the youngest son of the Queen of England.

The union, unpropitious as it appeared, proved a good thing for the king and the nation. The young queen was a highly intelligent lady remarkable for tact, courage and energy. She gained complete ascendancy over her erratic husband, and was able to divert him from the eccentricities which latterly, but for her intervention, might have involved his government in difficulties. She has for some time been practically the ruler of Holland, and so thoroughly has she gained the confidence of the people that they have invested her with the regency during the minority of her daughter. During the next ten years, if she lives, she will govern the four and a-half millions of people which is the population of Holland besides the thirty millions in the colonies over which Holland holds sway. These are Java, Sumatra, parts of Borneo and of New Guinea, and the Moluccas; also some islands in the West Indies, and Surinam in South America. Luxemburg, which also formerly formed part of the kingdom of Holland, will not be under the Queen's rule. The Salic law prevails there and conse-rently its throne passes to the rarest male relative of the late king. He is the duke Adolph William of Nassau who is seventy-three years of age. Luxemburg is a population of only a quarter of a million, but it occupies a position of immense strategic importance between the borders of Germany and France.

Queen Wilhelmina's education and training will be one of the most important duties devolving on the Queen Regent. She appears to be acting in a very sensible way in that matter. By her express orders the little queen is to be treated by her teachers as an ordinary pupil. She is never to be addressed by any title, but is to be called simply "Fraulein," and is to be thoroughly disciplined and taught without any consideration of her rank. "The royal road to learning" is thus to be in her case the same as that trodden by girls of less august station. The sentiments expressed by her mother in undertaking the charge will commend themselves to the Christian people of her realm. Queen Emma says in her proclamation; "May her throne find solid support in the fidelity and devotion of the people to the House of Orange! May the Almighty hear the prayers for the new Queen, and take her under his holy protection! Appointed Regent during the Queen's minority, I accept the task, confiding in God, and praying that its accomplishment may assure the welfare of the country and people and the consolidation of the kingdom."

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.

BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

IT is sometime since we had occasion to occupy our attention with that young scion of the aristocracy, Gerald Towneley, Esq. I don't know that it has been any very great loss either to myself or my readers. He is not at all the kind of character that I delight to write about, nor is he likely, I imagine, to fascinate other people to such an extent that they cannot bear him out of their sight. Yet like many other things one does not have any great fancy for he has his uses, and I must bring him and his behavior forward again and again in the development of this narrative of rural life.

True to his latest device for finding a "Sesame" into Nora Mansford's good graces, and for setting up a ready and convenient system of communication with her; and magnanimously ignoring the liberties Tabitha Crowle had taken with his cheeks, he paid special court to that sonsy body. Such an experience as he had had of her pugilistic abilities was likely to cultivate prudence on his part, and so his "lines of circumvallation," as military men say, were both numerous and subtly drawn.

What woman in the world, so famous for and so clever in her poultry management, could resist the gift of a splendid pair of Muscovy ducks on one occasion, and half a dozen eggs of "silver tuffs" for hatching on another?

One muddy day, after the rain had been falling in torrents, and Abram Hardale's shop-yard looked as if it were going in for competition with the duck-pond, Gerald Towneley, who had made business there about some new stable fitting, managed to tumble against an upreared plank just as Tabitha was passing with her milk-can, dressed in her after-work attire. The plank fell with a splash, and of course a good many splashes made mischief with Tabitha's gown. His courteous regrets, his painful distress, were something piteous to hear and see.

But what shall I say concerning that lovely "dress piece" of ever so many yards, with trimming material, and with such a nice letter in which Mr. Towneley's "respectful compliments" accompanied the gift? Seeing that he had "utterly spoiled" the dress she looked so well in, he could not in common honesty do other than send her another, etc.

Tabitha was not slow in showing her prize to Nora, and was not over well-pleased with the quiet, sober, and matter-of-fact way in which Nora looked at it and spoke of it. She blushed when Tabitha, with a meaning look, told her from whom it had come, but she said but little, and that little had but little heart. Poor Nora! It was enough to look at those pale cheeks, those dark rings around her sunken eyes, that drooping head that used to be lifted so roguishly for every little chance of fun; it was enough to listen to those sighs, so long, so tremulous, so deep, to know that she had little heart for anything, and least of all, for dress.

Tabitha was confirmed in her idea that Gerald Towneley had to do with Nora's trouble; and in view of that lovely dress and Nora's symptoms Tabitha felt that the gentlemanly young squire might perhaps be favored in his suit, for surely the open way in which he was trying to gain Nora's affections could mean no harm. Suffice it to say, that she did not seem to be able to resist his allurements, and seeing what she thought to be Nora's pining on his account, must therefore be considered on the whole as an ally, with young Towneley in his wooing.

"I do think you care a little for him, dear," she said, one day when she was trying to crack this difficult nut. To which Nora replied, blushing red at the same time: "No, indeed. I suppose I ought; and if I ought, I wish I could."

This was even more enigmatic than usual, and Tabitha began to have some very serious doubts as to whether she knew what she did say.

"What do you mean?" said downright Tabitha, wonderingly. "Surely you —"

"Oh, dear, dear, what am I saying?" said Nora, using a form of speech which seemed to come sadly familiar to her lately, and which was always uttered in a sad, despairing voice, as if the speaker were half dazed. So there came to be a sort of mute wonderment on the part of Tabitha, and a growing silence on the part of Nora, that had one happy effect, at any rate—it kept Tabitha from doing any great amount of mischief. She sought to put Gerald Towneley in the way of easily obtaining interviews with Nora, and when she heard whispers, rumors, reports that they had been seen together, she smiled and kept her counsel, coming to the natural conclusion that she had served Mr. Gerald and her Nora that far at least.

"Tabitha," said Nora, one day, when the two were sitting together busy in the kitchen in the repairs of some household linen, "If one tries hard to do what is right and best, and doesn't know the way, do you believe that God will show us what to do if we ask him?" She closed the question with a long, deep, heavy sigh.

Now, to tell the truth, this was a subject with which honest Tabitha had the smallest possible acquaintance. Honest as the day according to her lights, and thoroughly dependable and trustworthy in all the common duties of life, she was not at all acquainted with that higher love which opens up our communication with "Our Father which art in heaven." Probably she did "say her prayers" at set times—I am not sure; but if she did it was only a mechanical process, which was not even expected or supposed to have any influence on life and conduct. The wind-mill prayers of the Kalmuck Tartar would have served her purpose to much the same degree. She looked up from her needle wonderingly, and said nothing.

"My dear mother," continued Nora, "loved to pray. From my earliest childhood she taught me how to ask of God, and she said that many and many a time her Heavenly Father had heard and answered her, and that through all my life he would hear me, too. I used to think he did, and I did trust in the Saviour, and was happy in the confidence I had. But now I can't help doubting if it's true. I pray and ask, and ask and pray, Oh, how hard! I want to see the way. I'm a poor, weak, helpless girl, and am so wretched, and—" Here the girl, whose face had been quivering with suppressed feeling gave way, and burying her face in her hands, broke into a very passion of tears.

"Nay, nay, my poor bairn," said good-hearted Tabitha, drawing her chair to her side, and gently drawing the tearful face towards her, first to kiss the tears away, and then to lean the forlorn little head upon her own breast. "Tell your Tabbie all about it; mebbe I can help you, dear."

"No, Tabbie, dear;" said poor Nora, to Tabitha's approaches, "none, none can help me but God; and if he won't—"

That supposition meant blank despair, and that despair brought silence, choking silence once again.

"But he will," said Tabitha, emphatically—the religious instinct was only latent, not absent—"if he tells us to say, 'Our Father,' it won't be for nothing will it? It can't, you know; he wouldn't be a father if he could do like that. Try him again."

"I want you to ask him for me, Tabitha," Nora replied, putting her hand lovingly on her cheek.

"Me?" exclaimed her friend in amazement. "Yes, I know you love me, and I do need a friend, more than ever I did in all my life, a friend who will talk to God for me," said Nora, tremblingly.

"But what must I say?" queried Tabitha.

Nora arose, quietly took Tabitha's hand in hers, led her to her own room and made her kneel by her side. Then she poured her soul out to her Heavenly Father. Tabitha listening, awed, touched, and tearful. Having come to a conclusion, she said, Tabitha, say 'Amen' for me."

"Amen!" said Tabitha Crowle with a hearty emphasis. It was probably the first real prayer that had left her lips since her childhood.

"Amen!" she said again of her own accord. "O God, you are Nora's Father, an' she has no other. Do as she asks you; do!"

It was a very unconventional utterance. I am not quite sure that it would be accounted orthodox; but it was prayer, very real, and offered in spirit and in truth.

Tabitha was about to question her companion concerning the secret sorrow that was eating her heart out, and as it seemed to her eyes was sapping her weary life away. But she was cut short—

"Don't ask me, Tabbie, don't ask me anything," Nora replied, decisively, "I cannot tell you. Oh, how I wish there was naught to tell." Then she covered her face with her hands as if to hide it from the sight of all. Poor Nora! Tabitha forbore further question, but what she heard and what she saw gave her a sad sinking at the heart. She must leave it for the widow Appleton to do, and she hoped that George would not forget to get his mother to come, and that soon.

George was little likely to forget. He was too much concerned himself on Nora's account for that. "Mother" he said that night when he reached home, "I've been dismissed. Abram Hardale has told me to leave. I'm to bring away my tools on Saturday night."

"Is that what makes you look so down-hearted?" his mother asked. "You need not trouble. It wasn't for any fault of yours he discharged you, I'm sure of that. You'll soon get some place as good or better. We shall manage somehow. But is that all? Is there something else?"

"Well, yes, there is, mother," said George, frankly, "I'm afraid that Nora Mansford is getting sadly entangled with the wiles of young Towneley, and my heart aches for her a good deal."

Mrs. Appleton paused a moment before she replied. Her first thought was as to how far her lad was himself "entangled" with regard to that fair maiden. She had come to know Nora sufficiently, however, to enable her to face any possibilities of that kind with much serenity. Then she said with a smile, and firmly:

"Nora Mansford is too pure a girl, too true a woman, and too trustful a Christian, to be in danger of any entanglement, as you call it, either from that quarter, or of that kind. Be sure of that."

Now George Appleton told his mother much that he felt she ought to know—I don't think he told her about his willingness to "die for" the dark-eyed maiden—but the conversation ended with the understanding that Mrs. Appleton was to seek Nora's trust and confidence as to the heart-grief which threatened to sap her life, and to be, as far as she could be, mother to the orphan girl in the stress of her great need.

George did not see Nora the next day which was Saturday, but he thought of her continually, and as "he mused the fire burned"—the fire of indignation that Gerald Towneley should have made her miserable. That evening as he was returning home, his soul still hot within him as he thought of Nora Mansford's pinched and pallid features, he was rounding the corner of a fir plantation that edged the road, when he came plump upon the young squire himself. In the impulse of the moment, and in obedience to the dictates of his feelings, which the thoughts within him had worked up to fever heat, he slung the tool basket from his shoulder to the ground, let it drop with a heavy thud upon the grass, and stood upright in presence of the startled Gerald, with clenched hands and flashing eyes. His speech just then had little prudence in it: "Gerald Towneley!" said he, pale with passion. "What's your game?"

"Mr. Carpenter," said Towneley, loftily and scornfully in reply. "Pray, what's yours?"

George felt that he was putting himself at a disadvantage, that he had acted unwisely, and had spoken unadvisedly, and that in the interests of Nora herself he had better recede from an untenable position.

"I beg your pardon," said he, "but there is a thing or two about which I want a word with you." To this Mr. Gerald, of course with an added loftiness, responded "Mr. Carpenter, say on."

George had to make a rush for it, or he would certainly have been driven completely off the field.

"In a certain sense," said George who had not time to choose his words, "I am in trust for Miss Mansford, (I thought so," said Gerald Towneley to himself,) and I want to know what these constant interviews and secret meetings mean? If they are honorable on your part, then why are they secret? and if they are not, then I give you fair warning that there will be a quarrel between you and me. And now again I ask you, Gerald Towneley, what's your game? If it's honorable, if you mean fair and square by the girl, I'll stand aside, though I've no faith in you, and I have every fear for her, but if—here George clenched his fist and stammered and flushed a fiery red, and was silent, as though the very thought of harm to Nora drove him wild.

"And pray, Mr. Carpenter, who gives you the right to interfere?" If Hardale's charming niece has had the sense to choose me instead of you, how in the world could she do otherwise if the chance was given her? who are you to say her nay? and if she chooses to meet me in the—"

The sentence was not completed. George's blood mounted to his cheek; the centre of his muscular force was transferred to his hand and arm, and in another moment the cowardly insinuation was avenged. Unlike Tabitha Crowle's mode of warfare when she did such doughty deeds with her open hand, George had made a hard ball of his, and lodged it with the precision of a crack shot right on the orifice from which the lie had come. A very small amount of that kind of thing goes a long way with the Gerald Towneley type of individual. That fine young English gentleman all of the modern time, avoided further difficulty by pushing the aggressor backward with open hands, and taking his immediate flight, vowing in passionate language, the revenge he meant to take.

George Appleton, not by any means content with his own behavior, lifted the tool-basket to his shoulder, and resumed his homeward journey, with the strong conviction that so mean an antagonist was sure to devise some means of retaliation, and that it was needful for him to be on his guard.

Usually, George made his mother his full confidante, and through all the years had had but few secrets from her. He did not, however, say anything to her of his interview with young Towneley. The truth is, that he felt somewhat ashamed of himself because of his loss of self-command and could not bear the thought of meeting that peculiar look out of those beloved and eloquent grey eyes, that to him meant more than any form of words ever put together could express. Moreover, he did not care to arouse any fears for his own safety, that, he knew, would be sure to trouble her, from the young squire's threats of revenge.

WHAT WANT I MORE?"

A missionary visiting among the very poor and wretched, in the tenement houses of London, came across a woman in want and misery, and kindly asked what he could do for her—what she most. With a radiant smile came her parched lips the words, "I have what want I more?"

The heart of London city hid the dwellings of the poor, these bright, golden words were uttered: "I have Christ, what want I more?"

A lonely, dying woman stretched upon a garret floor, finding not one earthly blessing; "I have Christ, what want I more."

Who heard them ran to bring her something from the world's great store; as needless, died she saying, "I have Christ, what want I more?"

Her words will live forever, repeat them o'er and o'er: "I have Christ, what want I more?"

INVERTED TINKER'S WORK FOR CHRIST.

A FOREIGN evangelist relates this incident: A man named Sinclair said to me, as we went home, 'Smith, you know the way which I am living?' 'I do,' 'Well, is it to be done?' 'I think,' I replied, 'and better kneel here and have a word to say about it.' And while we knelt together, God's word came to him and he told him plainly what course to pursue. Twenty-four years he had been living in sin, and now, when he had come to the end of his way, he saw he must leave the broad path of sin, and enter into the narrow path of righteousness. Then he felt free to go for Christ and tell others what the Saviour had done for him. He was a carpenter and grinder, and every razor or pair of scissors which he repaired, he handed back to his customer, wrapped in a Gospel, with a secret prayer that it might be the salvation of their soul; and he has greatly owned his work. I have a telling me that in a small town in England a goodly number of souls have, through his ministry, passed from death to life.

TURNING POINT OF DR. HANNAY'S LIFE.

DR. HANNAY's secretarial colleague, the Rev. D. Burford Hooke, says an English man, who was in the habit of going to Dr. Hannay, had a custom, after he finished his business, to go round the house with a bell, announcing a temperance meeting. Young Hannay went to hear him, as the result became possessed of "a strong and almost passionate determination to be clear of the snares into which so many of his fellow-townsmen were continually falling." So "I made up my mind that I would not be a drunkard." He went on March 7, 1837, to a book-storer's shop where a pledge-book was kept. The book-seller was doubtful as to the wisdom of any but full grown men signing the pledge. He protested, but the lad's name was on the book, and almost before he knew it he was a pledge-taker. The good man could recover from his surprise the words "Alexander Hannay" were written in a round bold hand, and there they remained to this day. He himself regarded the signing of the pledge as the turning point in his life, for he recently he said, "Most positively I declare my belief that my position in this life, and any service I may have rendered to the cause of temperance or the cause of truth, is due to that one act."

CHRISTMAS WAITING.

"Wait for the promise of the Father." Acts 1:4.

The children sat in the homestead,
On the eve of the Christmas day,
And the father had made them a promise
In the morn when he went away:
A promise that he would bring them
A present of goodly things;
So they wait for his coming footstep,
And the gift that his strong arm brings.
We wait for our Father's promise, too,
For we know that his faithful word is true.

We wait for the Father's promise!
A living and precious seed:
He has planted it deep in our bosom,
For its blooming we ever plead.
We watch for its first upspringing,
Expecting a flower fair;
But, childlike, are sometimes impatient,
When finding no bright budding there,
Yet we wait for our Father's promise still,
For the seed he soweth no frost can kill.

We wait for our Father's promise!
We wait as for some dear friend,
Who comes from a distant country
With gifts that his love will send;
With smiles for his waiting children,
A kiss for the babes in grace:
We wait for the coming loved One,
And look for his sunny face.
Our Father's promise is on the way,
Let us go and meet it in hope's bright day.

3rd Edition Just Published.
Mr. Spurgeon's New Book WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISE FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR

THE CHEQUE BOOK OF THE FAITH. BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE. Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 100 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

In Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe the promises of God,—but many of them I have personally tried and proved, I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me. I have seen these daily portions when I was wading in the Surf of Controversy. Since then I have been a 'wader to swim,' which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in. The waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave, not mentioning this to exact sympathy, but simply the reader see that I am no dry-land sailor,—I have seen the roll of the billows, and the rush of the waves. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligence: "When it is a fact that this well-known book contains a Scripture Promise for EACH DAY IN THE YEAR, commencing on the first of January, by the prince of practical experimental preachers, enough has been said to merit as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the classroom wherever used will be found spiritually stimulating."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his spirit so sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reader's heart is almost sure to be excited to a mental and awakened holy aspiration. This book is brimful of quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

"Let us now go even unto Bethlehem." Luke 2: 15.

MID a thousand mercies we give each other holiday congratulations. By long established custom we exhort each other to healthful merriment. By gift, by Christmas-trees which blossom and fruit in one night, by early morning surprise, by clusters of lighted candles, by children's procession, by sound of instruments sometimes more blatant than musical, we wake up the night and prolong the day. I wish you all in the grandest, noblest, and best sense, a merry Christmas. The event commemorated is the gladdest of the centuries. Christ's cradle was as wonderful as his cross. Persuade me of the first and I am not surprised at the last. The door by which he entered was as tremendous as the door by which he went out.

I was last winter at the house where Jesus lived while he was in Africa. It was in Cairo, Egypt, the terminus of that terrible journey which he took when Joseph and Mary fled with him from Bethlehem to Egypt to escape the massacre of Herod. All tradition as well as all history point out this house in Cairo as the one in which these three fugitives lived while in Africa. The room is nine steps down from the level of the street. I measured the room and found it twenty feet long and seven and a half feet high. There are three shelves of rock, one of which I think was the cradle of our Lord. There is no window and all the light must have come from lantern or candle. The three arrived here from Bethlehem having crossed the awful desert.

On the Mediterranean steamer going from Athens to Alexandria, I met the eminent scholar and theologian, Doctor Lansing, who for thirty-five years has been a resident of Cairo, and he told me that he had been all over the road that the three fugitives took from Bethlehem to Egypt. He says it is a desert way and that the forced journey of the infant Christ must have been a terrible journey. Going up from Egypt, Doctor Lansing met people from Bethlehem, their tongues swollen and hanging out from the inflammation of thirst, and although his party had but one goat-skin of water left, and that was important for themselves, he was so moved with the spectacle of thirst in these poor pilgrims that, though it excited the indignation of his fellow travellers, he gave water to the strangers. Over this dreadful route Joseph and Mary started for this land of Egypt. No time to make much preparation. Herod was after them, and what were these peasants before an irate king? Joseph, the husband and father, one night sprang up from his mattress in great alarm, the beads of sweat on his forehead, and his whole frame quaking. He had dreamed of massacres of his wife and babe. They must be off, that night, right away. Mary put up a few things hastily, and Joseph brought to the door the beast of burden, and helped his wife and child to mount. Why, those loaves of bread are not enough, those bottles of water will not last for such a long way. But there is no time to get anything more. Out and on. Good-bye to the dear home they expect never again to see. Their hearts break. It does not need that ours be a big house in order to make us sorry to leave it.

Over the hills and down through the deep gorge they urge their way. By Hebron, by Gaza, through hot sand, under a blistering sun, the babe crying, the mother faint, the father exhausted. How slowly the days and weeks pass. Will the weary three ever reach the banks of the Nile? Will they ever see Cairo? Will the desert ever end? When at last they cross the line beyond which old Herod has no right to pursue, their joy is unbounded. Free at last. Let them dismount and rest. Now they resume their way with less anxiety. They will find a place somewhere for shelter and the earning of their bread. Here they are at Cairo, Egypt.

They wind through the crooked streets which are about ten feet wide, and enter the humble house where I have been to-day. But the terminus of the journey of these three fugitives was not as humble as their starting-point at Bethlehem. If that journey across the desert ended in a cellar, it started from a barn. In and around that barn in Bethlehem we tarry to day.

Everything humble around the barn but everything glorious overhead. Christ's advent was in the hostelry called the house of Chim Ham; the night with diamonded finger pointing down to the place; the door of heaven set wide open to look out; from orchestral batons of light dripping the oratorios of the Messiah; on lowest doorstep of heaven the minstrels of God discoursing of glory and good will. Soon after the white-bearded astrologists kneel, and from leathern pouch chink the shekels, and from open sacks exhale the frankincense and rustle out the bundles of myrrh. The loosened star: the escaped doxology of celestials; the chill December night aflush with May morn; our world a lost star, and another star rushing down the sky that night to beckon the wanderer home again, shall yet make all nations keep Christmas.

Are there no new lessons from the story not yet hackneyed by oft repetition? Oh, yes. Know in the first place, it was a sidereal appearance that led the way. Why not a black cloud in the shape of a hand or finger pointing down to the sacred birthplace? A cloud means trouble, and the world had had trouble enough. Why not a shaft of lightning quivering and flashing and striking down to the sacred birthplace? Lightning means destruction, a shattering and consuming power, and the world wanted no more destruction.

But it was a star, and that means joy, that means hope, that means good cheer, that means ascendancy. A star! That means creative power, for did not the morning stars sing together when the portfolio of the worlds was opened? A star! That means defence, for did not the stars fight in their courses against Sisera and for the Lord's people? A star! That means brilliant continuance, for are not the righteous to shine as the stars forever and ever? A star! That means the opening of eternal joy. The day star in the heart. The morning star of the Redeemer.

The unusual appearance that night may have been a strange conjunction of worlds. As the transit of Venus in our time was foretold many years ago by astronomers, and astronomers can tell what will be the conjunction of worlds a thousand years from now, so they can calculate backward; and even infidel astronomers have been compelled to testify that about the year one there was a very unusual appearance in the heavens. The Chinese record, of course entirely independent of the Word of God, gives as a matter of history that about the year one there was a strange and unaccountable appearance in the heavens.

But it may have been a meteor such as you and I have seen flash to the horizon. I saw a few years ago in the northern sky a star shoot and fall with such brilliancy and precision that if I had been on a hill as high as that of Bethlehem on which the shepherds stood, I could have marked within a short distance the place of the alighting. The University of Iowa and the British Museum have specimens of meteoric stones picked up in the fields, fragments flung off from other worlds, leaving a fiery trail on the sky. So that it is not to me at all improbable, the stellar or the meteoric appearance on that night of which we speak. I only care to know that it was bright, that it was silvery, that it flashed and swayed and swung and halted with joy celestial, as though Christ in haste to save our world had rushed down without his coronet, and the angels of God had hurled it after him!

Not a black cloud of threat, but a gleaming star of hope is our glorious Christianity. One glimpse of that stellar appearance kindled up the soul of the sick and dying college student until the words flashed from his pale fingers and the star seemed to pour its light from his white lips as Kirke White wrote:

When marshalled on the nightly plain
The glittering hosts bestud the sky,
One star alone of all the train
Can fix the sinner's wandering eye.
Hark! hark to God! the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem,
But one alone, the Saviour speaks,
It is the Star of Bethlehem.

Once on the raging seas I rode,
The storm was loud, the night was dark,
And rudely blew the wind that tossed my foundering bark;
Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Death struck, I ceased the tide to stem;
When suddenly a star arose,
It was the Star of Bethlehem.

Notice also in this scene, that other worlds seemed to honor our Lord and master. Bright star of the night, wheel on in thine orbit! "No," said the star, "I must come nearer and I must bend and I must watch and see what you do with my Jesus." Another world that night joined our world in worship. That star made a bow of obeisance. I sometimes hear people talk of Christ's dominion as though it were to be merely the few thousand miles of the world's circumference; but I believe the millions and the billions and the quadrillions of worlds are all inhabited—if not by such creatures as we are, still such creatures as God designed to make, and that all these worlds are a part of Christ's dominion. Isaac Newton, and Kepler, and Herschel only went on Columbus voyage to find these continents of our King's domain.

I think all worlds were loyal but this. The great organ of the universe, its pedals and its pipes and its keys all one great harmony save one injured pedal, save one broken stop—the vox humana of the human race, the disloyal world. Now you know that however grand the instrument may be, if there be one key out of order, it spoils the harmony. And Christ must mend this key. He must restore this broken stop. You know with what bleeding hand, and with what pierced side, and with what crushed foot, he did the work. But the world shall be attuned and all worlds will yet be accordant. Isle of Wight larger in comparison

But this scene also impresses me with the fact that the wise men of the East came to Christ. They were not fools, they were not you do not despise the mother. It was the life-long business of these astrologers to study the stars. Twenty-two hundred and fifty years before Christ was born, the wise men knew the precession of the equinoxes and they had calculated the orbit and the return of the comets. Professor Smith declares that he thinks they understood the distance of the sun from the earth. We find in the book of Job that the men of olden time did not suppose the world was flat as some have said, but that he knew and the men of his time knew the world was globular. The pyramids were built for astrological and astronomical study. Then, the alchemists spent their lives in the study of metals and gases and liquids and solids, and in filling the world's library with their wonderful discoveries. They were vastly wise men who came from the East, and tradition says the three wisest came, Caspar, a young man; Balthazar, a man in mid-life, and Melchior, an octogenarian. The three wisest men of all the century. They came to the manger.

So it has always been—the wisest men come to Christ, the brainiest men come to the manger. Who was the greatest metaphysician this country has ever produced? Jonathan Edwards the Christian. Who was the greatest astronomer of the world? Herschel, the Christian. Who was the greatest poet ever produced? John Milton, the Christian. Who was the wisest writer on law? Blackstone, the Christian. Why is it that every college and university in the land has a chapel? They must have a place for the wise men to worship. Come now, let us understand in ounces and by inches this whole matter.

In post-mortem examination the brain of distinguished men has been examined, and I will find the largest, the heaviest, the mightiest brain ever produced in America, and I will ask what that brain thought of Christ. Here it is, the brain weighing sixty-three ounces, the largest brain ever produced in America. Now let me find what that brain thought of Christ. In the dying moment, that man said: "Lord I believe, help thou mine unbelief. Whatever else I do, Almighty God, receive me to thyself for Christ's sake. This night I shall be in light and joy and blessedness." So Daniel Webster came to the manger. The wise men of the East followed by the wise men of the west.

Know also in this scene that it was a winter month that God chose for his Son's nativity. Had it been the month of May—that is the season of blossoms.

Had he been born in the month of June—that is the season of roses. Had he been born in the month of July—that is the season of great harvests. Had he been born in the month of September—that is the season of ripe orchards. Had he been born in the month of October—that is the season of upholstered forests. But he was born in a winter month,

The Angelic Messenger to the Shepherds, imbeciles. The record distinctly says that the wise men came to Christ. We say they were the magi, or they were the alchemists, or they were and that God is Christ, and that Christ is God, and that God is ours. Oh, does it not enlarge your ideas of a Saviour's dominion when I tell you that all the worlds are only sparks struck from his anvil? that all the worlds are only the fleecy flocks following the one Shepherd? that all the islands of light in immensity are one great archipelago belonging to our King?

the astrologists, and we say it with depreciating accentuation. Why, they were the most splendid and magnificent men of the century. They were the naturalists and the scientists. They knew all that was known. You must remember that astrology was the mother of astronomy, and that alchemy was the mother of chemistry, and because children are brighter than the mother

It was in closing December that he was born to show that this is a Christ for people in sharp blast, for people under clouded sky, for people with frosted hopes, for people with thermometer below zero. That is the reason he is so often found among the destitute. You can find him on any night coming off the moors. You can see him any night coming through the dark lanes of the city. You can see him putting his hand under the fainting head in the pauper's cabin. He remembers how the wind whistled around the caravansary in Bethlehem that December night, and he is in sympathy with all those who in their poverty hear the shutters clatter on a cold night.

It was this December Christ that Washington and his army worshipped at Valley Forge when without blankets they lay down in the December snow. It was this Christ that the Pilgrim Fathers appealed to when the Mayflower wharfed at Plymouth Rock, and in the years that went by, the graves digged were more in number than the houses built. Oh, I tell you, we want a December Christ, not a Christ for fair weather, but a Christ for dark days clouded with sickness, and chilling with disappointment, and suffocating with bereavement, and terrific with wide-open graves. Not a spring-time Christ, not a summer Christ, not an autumnal Christ, but a winter Christ. Oh, this suffering and struggling world needs to be hushed, and soothed, and rocked, and lullabied in the arms of sympathetic Omnipotence. No mother ever with more tenderness put her foot on the rocker of the cradle of a sick child than Christ comes down to us, to this invalid world, and he rocks it into placidity and quietness as he says: "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you."

Notice also a fact which no one seems to notice, that this Christ was born among the sheep, and the cattle, and the horses, and the camels, in order that he might be an alleviating influence to the whole animal creation. It means mercy for overdriven, underfed, poorly sheltered, galled and maltreated animal creation. Hath the Christ who compared himself to a dove, no care for the cruelties of the pigeon shooting? Hath the Christ who compared himself to a lamb, no care for the sheep that are tied and contorted, and with neck over the sharp edge of the butcher's cart, or the cattle train in hot weather from Omaha to New York, with no water—fifteen hundred miles of agony? Hath the Christ whose tax was paid by a fish, the coin taken from its mouth, no care for the tossing fins in the fish market? Hath the Christ who strung with his own hand the nerves of dog and cat no indignation for the horrors of vivisection? Hath the Christ who said, "Go to the ant," no watchfulness for the transfixed insects? Hath the Christ who said, "Behold the fowls of the air," himself never beheld the outrages heaped upon the brute creation which cannot articulate its grief? This Christ came not only to lift the human race out of its trouble, but to lift out of pang and hardship the animal creation. In the glorious millennial time the child shall lead the lion and play with the cockatrice only because brute and reptile shall have no more wrongs to avenge. To alleviate the condition of the brute creation Christ was born in the cattle-pen. The first bleat of the lamb of God heard amid the tired flocks of the Bethlehem shepherds. The white horse of eternal victory stabled in a barn.

But notice also in this account the three

Christmas presents that are brought to the manger. Gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Gold to Christ—that means all the affluence of the world surrendered to him. For lack of money no more asylums limping on their way like the cripples whom they helped, feeling their slow way like the blind people whom they sheltered. Millions of dollars for Christ where there are now thousands for Christ. Railroads owned by Christian stockholders and governed by Christian directors and carrying passengers and freight at Christian prices. George Peabody and Abbott Lawrences, and James Lenoxes no rarity. Bank of England, Bourse of France, United States Treasury, all the moneyed institutions of the world for Christ. The gold for Christ. Gold not merely paid the way of Joseph and Mary and the divine fugitive into Egypt, but it was typical of the fact that Christ's way shall be paid all around the world. The gold for Christ, the silver for Christ, the jewels for Christ. Australia, Nevada and Golconda for Christ. The bright, round, beautiful jewel of a world set like a solitaire on the bosom of Christ.

But I notice that these wise men also shook cave clear up to the silvery rafters of the starlit dome. Frankincense. That is what we shake out from our hearts to-day, so that the nostrils of Christ once crimsoned with the hemorrhage of the cross, shall be flooded with the perfume of a world's adoration. Frankincense. Frankincense in song, and sermon, and offertory, and handshaking, and decoration. Praise him, mountains and hills, valleys and seas, and skies and earth and heaven—cyclone with your trumpets, northern lights with your flaming ensign, morning with your castles of cloud, and evening with your billowing clouds of sunset. Do you know how they used to hold the censer in the olden time, and what it was made of? Here is a metal pan and the handle by which it was held. In the inside of this metal pan were put living coals, on the top of them a perforated cover. In a square box the frankincense was brought to the temple. This frankincense was taken out and sprinkled over the living coals, and then the perforated cover was put on, and when they were all ready for worship, then the cover was lifted from this censer and from all the other censers, and the perfumed smoke arose until it hung amid all the folds, and dropped amid all the altars, and then rose in great columns of praise outside or above the temple, rising clear up toward the throne of God. So we have two censers to-day of Christmas frankincense. Here is the one censer of earthly frankincense. On that we put our thanks for the mercies of the past year, the mercies of all our past lives, individual mercies, family mercies, social mercies, national mercies, and our hearts burning with gratitude send aloft the incense of praise toward the throne of Christ. Bring on more incense, and higher and higher let the columns of praise ascend. Let them wreath all these pillars, and hover amid all these arches, and then soar to the throne. But here is the other censer of heavenly thanksgiving and worship. Let them bring all their frankincense—the cherubim bring theirs out from their sacks the myrrh. The cattle came and they snuffed at it. They did not eat it because it was bitter. The pungent gum resin of Abyssinia called myrrh brought to the feet of Christ. That means bitterness. Bitter betrayal, bitter persecution, bitter days of suffering, bitter nights of woe. Myrrh. That is what they put into his cup when he was dying. Myrrh. That is what they put under his head in the wilderness. Myrrh. That is what they strewed his path with all the way from the cattle pen in Bethlehem to the mausoleum at Joseph's country seat. Myrrh. Yea, says the Psalmist, "All thy garments smell of myrrh." That is what the wise men wrapped in the swaddling clothes of the babe. That is what the Marys twisted in the shroud of a crucified Christ. The myrrh. Oh, the height, the depth, the length, the breadth of the Saviour's sorrow. Well might the wise men shake out the myrrh.

But I notice also from another sack they shake out the frankincense. Clear up to the rafters of the barn the air is filled with perfume, and the hostlers and the camel drivers in the furthest part of the building inhale it, and it floats out upon the air until passers-by wonder who in that rough place could have by accident dropped a box of alabaster. Frankincense. That is what they burned in the censer in the ancient temple. Frankincense. That means worship. Frankincense. That is to fill all the homes, and all the churches, and all the capitals, and all the nations, from cellar of stalactited and the seraphim theirs and the one hundred and forty and four thousand theirs, and all the eternities theirs, and let them smoke with perfume on this heavenly censer until the cloud canopies the throne of God. Then I take these two censers—the censer of earthly frankincense and the censer of heavenly frankincense—and I swing them before the throne, and then I clash them together in one great Hallelujah unto him to whom the wise men of the East brought the gold, and the myrrh and the frankincense. Blessed be his glorious name forever!

THE SIOUX INDIAN TROUBLES.

Congress Probably to Investigate the Death of Sitting Bull.

THERE now seems to be little doubt that Congress will fully investigate the Indian troubles in South Dakota, and the exciting series of events that terminated in the death of the famous Sioux Chief, Sitting Bull, as related in recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A resolution, looking to an official inquiry, has been introduced in the House of Representatives, providing for the appointment of a Commission to visit the scenes of the recent troubles and to inquire more particularly into the causes that led to the killing of the famous hostile by unfriendly Indians in the guise of Government police.

From his earliest boyhood, Sitting Bull was the enemy of the whites. When he grew to manhood he was involved in almost every disturbance or "rising" in which the Sioux nation took part, frequently as a leader. But the claim is made—and with what amount of truthfulness may appear on the coming investigation—that these Indian wards of ours were shamefully treated by conscienceless Government agents, being swindled in their supplies and frequently reduced to the point of starvation. In 1868, after many vain attempts to bring the powerful Sioux nation into subjection, a treaty was made by a Special Government Commission, under which these Indians agreed to sell the tract of land west of the Missouri River and north of the Platte, and to restrict themselves to the reservation assigned to them.

Several roving bands, however, never acknowledged the concession, and committed depredations upon white settlers from time to time. Sitting Bull was the most aggressive of the malcontents, maintaining his hostile attitude not only toward the representatives of the Government, but toward those tribes of his own people who rejected his rule and his policy with the whites. In 1874 he drove the Crows from their reservation, and next year attacked the settlers of Montana. Finally the Government ordered him to move with his band to the reservation by January 31, 1876. He did not obey, and on February 1, the Interior Department turned him over to the Department of War. In March, an expedition under General Crook destroyed the village of Crazy Horse's band in the Yellowstone Valley. On June 25, General Custer, with six hundred men of the Seventh Cavalry and four hundred infantry met a force of 2,000 or 3,000 Sioux at the Little Big Horn River. Custer and four companies under his command were butchered, and the remainder of the force put to flight. General Terry advanced upon the hostiles, who fled northward, Sitting Bull with a part of his band making his escape into British territory. He surrendered on a promise of pardon in 1880.

Again, in July, 1888, he influenced his tribe to refuse to relinquish the Indian lands. After that time he remained defiant, although the majority of his people repudiated him and accepted the Government's terms, agreeing to live peaceably on the reservation. Sitting Bull, despite his lost leadership, still claimed to be the head of the great Sioux nation of 35,000 souls, as firmly as when its warriors roamed across the 108,540 square miles of territory they possessed before the treaty of 1868.

Discontent at the repeated failures of supplies, the imminent danger of starvation in the winter months and the recent "Messiah" craze, all operated to bring about the recent troubles. The "ghost dances" at Pine Ridge and elsewhere, the summoning of the tribesmen, the final open defiance of Government authority in refusing to come into the Agency, and the retreat of Sitting Bull and his immediate followers to the "Bad Lands," have all been fully described in these columns. These "Bad Lands" are rocky and almost inaccessible fastnesses, destitute of soil and herbage, and affording a secure retreat for the hostiles, who cannot be followed there by white troops except at great peril to the latter.

The death of Sitting Bull, which formed the dramatic climax to a stormy career, occurred on December 15. With the remnant of his followers, he had retired to the Bad Lands, forty miles northwest of Fort Yates, in Southern Dakota, and joined the contingent of bad Indians already there, under chiefs Start Bull and Crow Dig, who were there entrenched with about two hundred Ogallala bucks. It was his intention to make a stand there and draw on the troops for a battle. Efforts to induce him to come to the Agency had proved abortive. Finally, as a last measure, Gen. Carr's command at Rapid Creek was ordered to advance and bring him in. About this time it was learned that Short Bull and Kicking Bear, two very bad Indians—the former said to be the murderer of Agent Appleton, who was killed at Pine Ridge sometime ago—joined the hostiles and there was danger of the rebels securing enough reinforcements to make dislodgment a difficult task. A force of Indian police was sent forward on a forced march, with orders to bring in Bull at all hazards. Following them came United States troops and a Hotchkiss battery. They reached the camp in the early morning, and a hand-to-hand fight took place, in which Sitting Bull and seven of his warriors were killed, and four Indian policemen were killed and several wounded. Among the dead was Crowfoot, Sitting Bull's son. The troops then came up, and the hostiles fled west up Grand River. At latest accounts, many of the disaffected had surrendered. A company of the Eighth Cavalry, under Captain Fountain, were in a perilous position at Cave Hills, in the Bad Lands, being surrounded by Indians, but it was hoped that they would be able to keep the hostile Indians at bay till help arrived.

One of the pictures on the first page shows the last camp-fire of the Sioux Chief, before his fatal encounter with the Indian police. A portrait is given of Brig.-General Nelson A. Miles, the greatest of Indian fighters since the death of General Crook. The type of a Sioux squaw is interesting, as showing a strong and unusually intelligent face, while Sitting Bull's features reveal to some extent the craft and cunning of the man, who will doubtless long be revered by the Sioux as a patriot and martyr to the cause of Indian freedom.

ONE attraction which the visitor to Jaffa (the ancient Joppa) generally sees is the store in which pearls are sold, a picture of which appears on page 845. It is a noted place in the old town and its fame has spread to other lands. From ancient times pearls have been favorite articles of decoration, and tradition says that this famous mart for them dates back many centuries. Here they are still seen in great profusion in all sizes and degrees of purity. Most of them are of the variety found in the Red Sea which surpasses others in size and lustre.

Pearls are the concretions of shelly matter deposited within the valves of certain bivalve mollusca. It is generally believed that the cause of the formation of the pearl is the presence between the shells of a grain of sand, which, irritating the exceedingly sensitive body within, leads it to protect itself by enclosing the grain of sand in a thin layer of calcareous matter. This gets new layers as the thickness of the pearly lining of the shell increases and so the jewel is formed. The layers are so inconceivably thin that they cannot be detected by the naked eye. Their edges do not always end evenly and it is this which determines the value of the pearl, those of the finest water having them closest. The size of an Oriental pearl varies from that of a pea to three times that size.

Pearls are frequently mentioned in Scripture as a type of precious things. "The merchantman seeking goodly pearls" (Matt. 13 : 45), the woman "decked with gold and pearls" (Rev. 17 : 4), and "the twelve gates which were twelve pearls" (Rev. 21 : 21), are some of these.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Remarkable Case of Suspended Animation is reported from St. Paul, Minn. The Globe of that city states that an iron-worker on returning from work on December 10, complained to his wife of irresistible drowsiness. He said that all day he had been only half awake and at times he had almost fallen down in slumber among his tools. He went to bed immediately after taking his supper and slept heavily. In the morning his wife was horrified on going to wake him to find him cold, rigid, and apparently dead. She sent at once for a doctor, who at first believed that life was extinct, but after a more careful examination, he declared that he was still alive. All efforts to arouse him proved futile until an electric battery was brought and an electric current applied to the soles of his feet. Then his limbs began to twitch, and after a minute he drew up both feet and opened his eyes. Gradually he recovered the use of his limbs and, before night, he was able to get up. Physicians who have examined him, believe that his case is one of the many varieties of epilepsy, though it is a very rare one. Similar symptoms are not so rare in spiritual maladies. Every clergyman has mourned over men who seemed dead while living and irresponsible to all efforts to arouse them to a sense of their condition. (Eph. 5 : 14.)

A Train Was Stopped by Weeds in Oregon, Recently. The Portland Oregonian says, that the engineer of a train proceeding along the Oregon and Washington Territory line, when near Pendleton, noticed that a strong wind was carrying into the cut a quantity of tumble-weeds. They flourish on the lands on each side of the railroad cutting. The farmers had sent harrows over the land, which tore them up and left them, not much injured, on the surface of the land. The wind rolled them over the edge of the cutting on the tracks. The engineer knew what they were and passed over them without stopping, but presently he found his train slowing up. The wheels went round, but the train did not move. An examination showed that the weeds when crushed had greased the tracks with their sap. Looking along the line the weeds could be seen lying more or less thickly on the tracks for a long distance ahead, and, they could not clear them away. Accordingly the train remained in the cutting till morning. It was apparently a very slight obstacle, but it seems to have been sufficient to hold the train. The progress of the Christian in the divine life is often hindered by obstacles as trivial. The small temptations which he feels able to deal with in his own strength are often those which overcome him and lead him to the sin that cripples his usefulness. (Prov. 28 : 26.)

An Impecunious Immigrant was Refused Permission to land in New York on December 23. He was a steerage passenger on the Spre which arrived from Germany on that day. When the passengers were examined at the barge office this man acknowledged that he was absolutely penniless. He said that he formerly lived at Pittsburg, Pa., but last spring he went on a visit to his mother who lived in Germany. He spent all his own money and was unable to pay his way back to America. His mother gave him two hundred and fifty dollars for the purpose, but he spent all of it but just enough to buy a steerage ticket. The immigration commissioners said he must be sent back to Germany, but the man declared that he had lost his German citizenship during his residence in this country. He omitted to naturalize himself here, so that he was in the unpleasant position of being a man without a country. He pleaded hard to be allowed to remain, but the commissioners were inexorable and he was ordered to return on the ship. There is reason to fear that many will be in a similar condition when Christ comes. Having connected themselves with a Church the world casts them off, yet they have not united with Christ by a living faith and therefore have no citizenship in heaven. To all such in spite of their pleas of church-membership Christ will say, "Depart from me." (Luke 13 : 25.)

IDOLATRY IN ISRAEL.

S. S. LESSON FOR JAN. 11, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
I. KINGS 12 : 25-33; GOLDEN TEXT, EX. 20 : 4.

What an Idol is—God's Rival—Jeroboam Informed of the Reasons for his Elevation—The Conditions of Prosperity—Jeroboam's Indifference to the National Idolatry—His Countenance of the Sin—His Measures to Consolidate his Kingdom—Anxious Christians—Peace from Confidence in God—Jeroboam's New Theology.

"LITTLE children keep yourselves from idols" (1. John 5 : 21), was the word of the aged apostle John to his children in the faith. "My dearly beloved, flee from idolatry," was the exhortation of Paul to the believing Corinthians. (1. Cor. 10 : 14.) Everything which takes the place of God is an idol. The tendency of the natural heart is to be independent of God, and as man is not self-existing, the place in his confidence and his affection which God claims is given to earthly things and persons, and thus man becomes an idolater.

Nothing is so simple, and nothing so great and dignified, as a life really lived with God. "Enoch walked with God," he was no idolater. Between him and his Maker there was a perfect, unbroken understanding. Such a life implied a separation from the earthly circumstances, the opinions of men, his own experience, and all those things which men ordinarily put in the place of a simple dependence on, and obedience to, God, had no voice in the life of Enoch. Unclogged by the clay of this world, he was more heavenly than earthly, and the result of his life is summed up in the grand but simple words "and he was not, for God took him." (Gen. 5 : 24.) God has made it possible for man, who has heard the Gospel and who knows his Bible, to walk with him as holy men of old did. But the larger number of God's children need, as much as did the Corinthians of old, the exhortation, "My dearly beloved flee from idolatry."

When God had sent the prophet Ahijah to apprise Jeroboam of his purpose to trust the government of the ten tribes of Israel into his hand, he first told him that his reason for doing so was the idolatry of the people. "Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee . . . Because that they have forsaken me, and have worshipped Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, Chemosh the god of the Moabites, and Milcom the god of the children of Ammon; and have not walked in my ways, to do that which is right in mine eyes, and to keep my statutes and my judgments, as did David his father." (1. Kings 11 : 31-33.) Is it conceivable that this man, in whom God placed such confidence would actually institute a national idolatry of such an order that he earned for himself the enduring and world-wide reputation of "Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin?" Every man is either

A Worshipper or an Idolater, either possessed by God, or by something which takes God's place. God had declared to Jeroboam that he chose David "because he kept my commandments and my statutes," and he appealed to Jeroboam to follow in the same path: "And it shall be if thou wilt hearken unto all that I command thee, and wilt walk in my ways and do that which is right in my sight, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as David my servant did; that I will be with thee, and will build thee a sure house, as I built for David, and I will give Israel unto thee." (V. 38.)

Jeroboam came to the throne. He fully understood the communication of the prophet, but idolatry was in his heart, and his first act as king was to look after his own interests. Raised up by God in consequence of the departure of his people from him in the time of Solomon. Jeroboam made no move towards the suppression of idolatry, but occupied himself in his own aggrandizement, in building Shechem and dwelling there. Self was his idol, his position as king was more to him than God who had given him his kingdom, and the idolatry which broke out later in his kingdom was already set up in his heart. From Shechem he went out and built Peniel. All for Jeroboam, nothing for the Lord. And meanwhile the people were indulging in idolatry unrebuked by the king, and his guilty indifference went to countenance them in their sin. "He that gathereth not with me scattereth." There is no middle course, in the kingdom of God; every hour of our lives we are bearing witness for God or against him, helping souls into oneness with him, or in some way scattering them from him. Selfishness prepares the way for further transgression. Jeroboam, having begun by considering himself before his God, goes a step further. O child of God, beware of the deadly nature of selfishness, or the idolatry of self. All self-consideration gives the lie to the life of Christ who "pleased not himself." It claims life for that "old man" which is crucified with Christ. (Rom. 6 : 6.) Jeroboam truly lived under the old dispensation, in which the Christ-life was unknown, but obedience was as much required then as now, and his yielding to selfishness led on to disobedience and unbelief. "Jeroboam said in his heart, now shall the kingdom return to the house of David: if his people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people return unto their Lord, even unto Rehoboam, king of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam king of Judah." Where was God in all this reasoning? Nowhere at all. It was rank idolatry. The promise of God to him was ignored, as though God were no more than one of the false gods of the heathen; Jeroboam acted as though God were powerless and as though he could care for himself, his throne, and his people better than God could.

No Neutrality

among the children of God? What is it which causes the sleepless nights and the anxious, worn look by day? What causes the depression which drives many into asylums, and which brings so many to burden others with their troubles? Is it not unbelief in the immediate first-hand intervention of God in all things? Is it not distrust in him and his fatherly love and wisdom? Who can believe that God is doing right, and yet continue oppressed under that which he believes is working out blessing for him? Who can be filled with alarm and apprehension of evil at the same time as he believes that infinite wisdom is guiding everything which happens, and infinite love is caring for his interests? Yet how often we hear Christians say, "If I witness faithfully for God, and give up that in my business which is not thoroughly straight, I am sure to be a loser, everyone does as I do, I can't help it." This is idolatry, it is making business immorality to be a stronger power than God, it is to argue as though there were no God to come in and undertake for his faithful children. What is it but idolatry? Again, how many argue, I cannot live in such a place, or exist on such and such a diet; my health requires a better atmosphere, or more nourishing food, or lighter work, etc., etc. Where is

God in the Matter?

Is it his will you should live where you do? Are you satisfied with his will? Can you trust him that that will is "good, acceptable and perfect?" Then, trust him to make it the right thing for your health, or, by his own control of events, to remove you elsewhere, and be satisfied where you are until he does so. The very kicking against your circumstances is idolatry, you are treating them as mightier than God.

Jeroboam failed to reckon that God had perfect power to maintain his authority over his people when they went up to Jerusalem to worship. But the king's conscience was not at ease. How could he expect God to uphold his authority when he had not been witnessing to the authority of God? He could not. Faith and disobedience cannot exist together. Thus Jeroboam "took counsel." It goes without saying that God was not his chosen counsellor.

Like many a man who will not bow to God, he chose his counsellors from those whose interest it was to agree with him, and he repeated the sin of Aaron in the wilderness, by making two golden calves. Then he made an appeal to the people whose unrebuked idolatry had prepared them for further sin, and, like himself, he Appealed to Their Selfish Instincts.

How could a selfish man take them on higher ground? Although it was a matter which immediately concerned the glory of God, Jeroboam did not so much as mention his name. He said, "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem." Mean man, currying favor with the people, and serving his own selfish purpose, at the expense of God and the souls of the people who were entrusted to him. "Too much for you;" the very words with which so many are hindered by worldly relatives from a life of devotion to the Lord; the very plea which self brings up against the call of Jesus, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me."

Jeroboam, having got the people on his side, instituted a new theology, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." The very history of God's deliverances of old was ignored, and the golden calves which demanded no circumcision of heart, no confession of sin, no restitution, no obedience to the law, became the idols of Israel and the worship of Jehovah went out of date.

And now Jeroboam, having got rid of God from the religion of Israel, had everything his own way and Dan, on the extreme north, became the rallying place for worshippers. Bethel was too near Jerusalem. His priests were chosen, not from the tribe of Levi, but from the lowest of the people; they served his purpose better; and the feast, which was a substitute for the holy Passover, Pentecost, and the feast of tabernacles, was held "in the month which he had devised of his own heart." Thus idolatry became a national institution in Israel, and the people of the Lord ceased to be his witnesses among the nations.

A LOST IDENTITY.

A SINGULAR case of spontaneous hypnotism was described last week in the New York Sun, by Dr. Hodgson of the Society of Psychical Research. He says that a clergyman in a town of Rhode Island suddenly and mysteriously disappeared on January 17, 1887. He went to the bank that morning and drew out a sum of money to pay off the mortgage on his house. Then he went to his son's home, where he dined. He said he would go to his sister's while he was in town and he set out in the direction of her house, apparently in his usual health and spirits. Nothing more was heard of him for three months, and his family after making thorough search for him, concluded that he must be dead. What he really did was to go to Philadelphia where he remained a week. Then he went to a village in the neighborhood, where he hired a store. He stocked it with goods, and it was a success from the first day. He slept in a room in the rear of the store and behaved like other men, but he gave a name not his own. Three months from the day he left his Rhode Island home, he awoke one morning in a state of excitement calling out that he did not know where he was. The other tenants in the house went to him and told him he was in his own room at the back of his own store. He said he had no store, but was a clergyman and told them his right name and address. As they laughed at him he begged them to telegraph to his Rhode Island home for confirmation of his statements. His son came on promptly in response to the telegram and was delighted to find his father still alive. He sold out the store and took his father back with him. The strangest feature of the case is that the clergyman's mind was a perfect blank as to the events that occurred during the three months of his absence. He recollected leaving his son's house in January, but could remember nothing afterward till the time of his awakening that morning in March. Indeed he was with difficulty convinced that three months had elapsed. Yet the people with whom he had come in contact declared that he had acted rationally all the time. Dr. Hodgson says that his conduct was so like the conduct of persons when under hypnotic influence that he believes the man unconsciously hypnotized himself. The case is extremely mysterious and will form a problem for scientists and physicians. In this it differs from that species of double life, unhappily too common, of outward respectability, and secret sin, and that other double life which is still more common, the conflict of the two natures, in the agony of which, the Apostle cried out, "What I would that do I not; but what I hate that do I. Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. 7: 15, 25.)

ADVENT SIGNS AFTER APRIL, 1891.

BY REV. M. BAXTER.

THOSE who accept the chronological conclusion from Daniel's dates that the final Ten Jewish Years of this Age will be precisely from the end of Passover week, April 30, 1891, to the end of Passover Week, April 11, 1901, will look forward with expectant vigilance to May-day, 1891, and the months that immediately follow it, as likely to witness the commencement of those decisive Second Advent Signs, which are indicated in Christ's Eschatological predictions in the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew to be progressively fulfilled during the final Ten Years of this age.

None of those Special Signs which Christ then foretold to be the immediate forerunners of his Second Advent, and to cause the wise virgins to raise the Midnight Cry, have yet taken place. He specified them in Matthew 24, and Mark 13, and Luke 21, in answer to the inquiry, "What shall be the Sign of Thy Coming and of the End of the World?" (or Age) to be as follows:

"Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines and pestilence, and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven . . . There shall be Signs in the Sun and in the Moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity: the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." In Mark 13: 8, the same prophecy reads thus: "There shall be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and TROUBLES" — i. e., social commotions, strikes, democratic disturbances, etc.

These particular prophetic wars, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, troubles, atmospheric and celestial phenomena have not yet taken place because when they do occur, they will be such peculiar and extraordinary wars, troubles, etc., as to be recognised by the Wise Virgins, according to Matt. 25: 1-10, as Distinct and Definite Signs of the Speedy Advent of Christ. But hitherto there have never been any such prophetic wars or troubles so as to be identified by the Wise Virgins as indicating the Advent of Christ to be at hand. No past wars have been signs of Christ's Advent. But if between Passover Week, 1891, and Passover Week, 1892, the greatest European War ever known shall break out, and presently change the existing twenty-three Kingdoms or States into Ten Confederated Kingdoms prefigured by Daniel's Ten-Horned Wildbeast, such an event will be recognised by the Wise Virgins as the Prophetic War predicted by Christ in Matthew 25, to be a sign of His speedy Advent.

The Ten Final Years of this Age are mystically indicated by there being Ten Virgins and Ten Horns on the Wild Beast and Ten Toes on the Prophetic Image in Daniel 7: 24; 2: 38, to be the Prophetic Period during which the predictions connected with those Ten Virgins and Ten Horns and Ten Toes will be fulfilled, just as Seven Years were mystically indicated by the Seven Kine and Seven Ears of Corn: and three days by the three branches and three baskets in Genesis 40: and 41.

The very fact that 1890 has passed so quietly without any of these Signs in Europe, may be accounted for by the circumstance that they are indicated not to commence until after April, 1891, as being the commencement of the Final Ten years of the prophetic period of the Ten Virgins being aroused by startling events to look for Christ's Advent.

It is noteworthy that May 1, 1891, is fixed as the Great Labor Demonstration Day in the principal cities of Europe, when vast numbers of laborers are to parade and hold mass meetings, thereby giving a great impetus to Democratic agitation. And May 1, 1891, is the first day of the Final Ten Years which will be from the end of Passover Week, on April 30, 1891, to the end of Passover Week, April 11, 1901.

The reasons why Passover Week 1901 is the Last Week of this Age, are fully set forth in the book of 600 pages, Forty Coming Wonders (with fifty pictures—75 cents), and the pamphlet, Coming Wars and Great Events, and the End of this Age in 1901 (20 cents, from Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York.) It is there shown that Daniel's 2,300 years began with "the Command to rebuild Jerusalem" on Nisan 22, B. C. 445, and ended on Nisan 22, 1856, when the Crimean War Treaty of Peace was signed, which commenced the cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land. The 1,290 years also ended at the same point of time. Then the 1,335 years, which are 45 years longer than the 1,290 years, end on Nisan 22, 1901, which is 45 years beyond Nisan 22, 1856, that is, on April 11, 1901, as the time of full blessedness. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1,335 years." (Dan. 12: 11, 12; 8: 14; 9: 25; Neh. 2: 1.)

THE IDOLS OF THE MARKET.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Jan. 11. "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." Exodus 20: 4.

"GLAD to see you looking so well, brother Mills," said Deacon White, addressing a young business man, who was standing in front of his dry-goods store, superintending the unpacking of some goods.

"Oh, yes, my health keeps good. I have a splendid constitution. Never sick, though I get run down sometimes with business worries."

"I was afraid you were sick yesterday, not seeing you at church."

"No, I was tired out; had a very hard week. These holiday times one has to be at it early and late to keep up with the work, and on Saturday night I was about done up. I had a good day's rest yesterday and I feel a new man."

"Yes, we would all be worn out if it were not for the Sunday," said the deacon. "It is one of God's best boons. If we had nothing else to thank him for, we owe him gratitude for that. The pity of it is, we are so apt to forget that we do owe it to him and do not use it as he meant us to do."

"I wonder if Deacon White meant anything by that speech," Mr. Mills said to himself, after the deacon had gone on his way to his office. "I made a rest day of my Sunday and that was intended, surely. If I did not go to church, I did not do any work. It was a temptation to post up the bank account, but I did not do it."

The young man was uncomfortable. He insisted that his conscience did not upbraid him, and the deacon certainly had not done so, but his words had sounded like a gentle reproof. Mr. Mills fretted under it; if his conscience was at ease, it did not save him from attaching a meaning to Deacon White's words, which under other circumstances would not have disturbed him. "I'll ask him what he meant," Mr. Mills said.

"Don't you think what I said was true?" Deacon White rejoined, when, a few days afterward, Mr. Mills asked his question. "You agree with me I am sure. What made you think I meant anything personal? Your conscience reproach you?"

"Why, no; I needed rest, and Sunday is for rest. Business takes a great deal out of one these days. You cannot succeed unless you put all your mind into it."

"That's so," said the deacon. "We must be on our guard, though, against forgetting the second commandment."

"The fourth you mean, Deacon. The second is, 'Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image.' That always seems to me a superfluous commandment to read to American citizens."

"You think there is more danger of their worshipping no God at all, than of multiplying objects of worship? Yet the second is the commandment I mean. I have known men to worship the graven image Uncle Sam makes."

"Oh, you mean the dollar, well, I am far enough from worshipping it. I only want to make my business a success. When I took hold of it, I was not so well prepared as most young men are when they start. My capital was too small. I am making up for it by running short-handed and doing a good deal of work myself. A man had better work when he is young than when he is old, eh Deacon?"

"Yes, I believe in that. The dollar is a useful thing," the deacon added sententiously. "The mischief is that we get so much attached to it that we are apt to make too many sacrifices for its sake. It is worth a good deal, but not everything. We sometimes come in business to a place where two roads meet. On one side there is the way in which we will please God; on the other, the way to make the dollar. When a man hesitates he is in a bad way."

"Yes, but you cannot call him an idolater."

"Oh, I don't know. When a man thinks more of the dollar than of his God, I think he deserves the name."

"That is not my case. I care nothing for money itself. It is only so far as I need it to keep my credit good and make a provision for old age, that I care for it."

"That is legitimate," said the deacon, "only let God be first in all." And with that they parted.

Mr. Mills made a successful business man. The goal of his ambition—a provision for his old age was secured. He was not seen so often in church as before, and he found himself obliged to relinquish his Sunday School class and all other religious work; for his energies were absorbed in business. He kept up his contributions to the church and even increased them, feeling that they in some measure atoned for his lack of personal service. He had intended to take up his religious work when he had reached this financial position; but he postponed it as he made a new goal for his ambition. He wanted to see his business the largest in the city. He believed that with a few more years of work he could take his place among millionaires. He redoubled his efforts, took advantage of every opportunity for buying cheap and, people said, he drove bargains that were sometimes very hard when sellers were in need. He cut down wages, so that his employees could barely live. But, as he said, if they did not like to work for such sums they could leave. There were plenty ready to supply their places. Business was business.

Deacon White had occasion to call upon him in these days of prosperity. A new church was in contemplation and Mr. Mills was ready to do his share in the work. He wrote a cheque for a large sum and said, as he handed it to the deacon, "You see, I do not worship money as you thought some years ago I was in danger of doing. I give freely. I expect that is the largest sum on your list."

"Money is not the only kind of graven image there is, my friend," the deacon answered. "I would not like to say that your reputation among financial magnates is not an image that you have graven for yourself. Could you bear to give all you have away and become a poor man if God asked you to do it?"

"That is a foolish question, deacon."

"You are not required to do it; but as you cannot avow yourself ready to do it, I am afraid I cannot acquit you. Your position is dearer to you than your God. You worship a graven image."

A WORD WITH TEACHERS.

PROMPTNESS is absolutely necessary. A punctual teacher makes a punctual class. Washington said to his secretary, who was always excusing himself for being late because his watch was not right, "Sir, you will have either to get another watch or I will get another secretary." With wonderful regularity the world moves. Hundreds of years before, the astronomer will tell you what time the sun will rise and set. The comet has a law, so that the philosopher will tell you what night it will first appear. At just the right time the bud bursts and the leaf unfurls, and yet there are thousands of people in our Sunday Schools and Churches who are always behind. If you should happen to see them prompt on any one occasion you would think it a wonder; you would have to look again and again, lest it were an optical delusion. The fact is they are always too late; and they will die too late, and they will get up in the resurrection too late, if it is possible for them to sleep over time. Be prompt—not only prompt at the beginning, but prompt at the close. A Sabbath School that lasts more than an hour and twenty minutes injures the child and hurts the cause of Christ. Out of twenty schools in the United States nineteen keep in too long. Children get worn out, and Christian workers get worn out, and they are unfit for the other duties of the holy Sabbath day. Begin promptly at the right time. Close promptly at the right time.

Then, be industrious. There is no railroad on the road on which Bunyan's pilgrim travelled. If you are going to get the truth of God's Word for the children you will have to dig for it. You will have to "double the Cape" if you want to reach this land of gold. There never will be an overland route. It is by the sweat of your brow that you are to get this divine bread. You will have to sharpen and scour up the sword of truth if you want it to flash and cut. As much depends on the way you present the truth as upon the truth itself. The best food may be spoiled in the cooking. Do not spend the whole afternoon in telling the child something he knows, or in trying to count the teeth in the jaw-bone of the ass with which Samson smote the Philistines. Talk not about non-essentials and nonentities. You have a half hour or an hour to do the work for eternity. Be busy. You have no right to be dull; it is a crime to be dull in your class. God has filled the world with music and with illustration, and the plainest brook will tell you of the fountain of living water, and the smallest flower will speak of the lily of the valley, and the faintest star will point down to the manger; and while Sabbath School teachers are watching their flocks, as did the Bethlehem shepherds, the air will be full of angels singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." And then, be cheerful. Never scowl or scold in the Sabbath School. You cannot catch children with the vinegar of a sour visage; you may catch them with Gospel honey.

NO SINNERS.

THERE was a Church reported in a Presbytery as being all saints and no sinners. There were no sinners converted, because there were none of that kind to be had. Oh, why did not that Church go outside and see if in a city of several hundred thousand there were not some who ought to be converted? The truth is, we are all busy polishing and splicing and adorning a few Christians who are already saved, rather than going out to work in the forests of Lebanon, all the axes ringing on the cedars. We are so anxious to raise six or seven hills of large corn that we let fifty acres go to waste by sheer neglect. Prayer-meetings, Sabbath Schools, and Churches are no better than a literary society or a social club, unless it be to lift men out of sin into Christ. One year after all the Christian Church wheels into line with that idea, we shall have the millennium.

MEETING AN EXIGENCY.

WE give it up. People will take trouble by the forelock. And so we propose to show that the most of our troubles have nothing but forelock. You say, "How if I should get sick?" God will not forsake you then. In those times of darkness, the Saviour will be especially near to you. When all worldly sympathy fails, you will feel the need of a divine arm to lean upon, and in the hour of pain and distress the Saviour will be more to you than he is now. There may come days of poverty. Those who are now pleased with your association may turn their backs upon you. You may have to move out of the pleasant surroundings in which you are now settled. Do you think you will be able to endure the stress of these adverse circumstances? Yes, you will. When earthly treasures fade from your soul, you will feel the need of heavenly treasures. God will not forsake you in those times. There may come days of bereavement upon you. You look around upon your household and say: "How could I spare one of these loved ones?" Perhaps you think now that you would not be able to go through such sorrow; but God would not forsake you. He would help you through that trouble as he has through all the trouble of the past. There may be in your future life days of satanic assault; do you think you will be able to endure them? It seems sometimes as if the powers of darkness come down upon a man's soul when he is least able to combat with them. Will you be able to stand them? You will. Satan has been disputing your path heavenward ever since you have started. He is no stronger now than he was in the past, and he will be no stronger in the future. Christ has bruised the head of the serpent. God is mightier than all your foes. The hour of death is coming; many in that exigency fail. There is a deep darkness that comes down upon the pillow that no earthly light can scatter. Alas for anyone that comes to die without the grace of Jesus! But having put your trust in the Redeemer, that final hour will be an occasion of joy. He will not bring you all through your life to that last moment and then fail you. Upon your pillow there will dawn the brightness of heaven. You can say now, without any boasting, without any egotism, without any rashness: "Nothing shall separate me from the love of God in Christ Jesus; neither things present nor things to come."

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. B. Fay Mills expects to commence a series of evangelistic meetings in Evanston, Ill., on January 22. Rev. C. S. Billings has been holding services in Ainsworth, Neb., with blessed results. During his twelve-days' mission at Verdon, Neb., there were many conversions.

Major Whittle hopes to have the assistance of Rev. W. F. Barnett of Newark, Ohio, in his evangelistic work this season. Mr. Barnett is a singer of singular sweetness and power.

The Christian Endeavor movement is spreading rapidly in Australia. Though the first Union is only a year old, there is now a sufficient membership to form a United Society.

Major Cole's work in Arkansas is being much blessed. His meetings at Fayette were attended by vast numbers, and there were many remarkable conversions. Mr. F. S. Jewett conducts the musical part of the services.

Rev. Alexander Patterson's course of lectures to Bible Students at the Bible Institute, Chicago, were productive of so much interest that he has since delivered them at Hannibal, Mo., and Peru, Ind., with much success.

Count George Waldstein, who died within three months of the death of his young wife, Countess Pasqualine Metternich, has left his whole fortune, which amounts to about half a million florins, to the poor of Vienna, for whom a home is to be founded with the money. The young couple were married five years, but left no children.

At the celebration of the seventeenth anniversary of the founding of the Reformed Episcopal Church in Boston, Mass., recently, there was a union service of congregations worshipping in the vicinity. The meeting was held with the church on Dartmouth Street, of which the Rev. J. M. Gray is rector. It was stated that there are now over one hundred churches of that order in the country.

Arrangements are nearly perfected for the World's Council of Congregational Churches to be held in London next July. It is proposed that there shall be three hundred delegates. One hundred from the United States, one hundred from Great Britain, and one hundred from other countries. Among the American delegates are Dr. William Taylor, of New York; Dr. A. J. F. Behrends, of Brooklyn; and Rev. C. F. Thwing, of Minneapolis.

Major-General O. O. Howard has undertaken mission work in New York since he was stationed at Governor's Island in command of the U. S. troops. He and his son have been teaching Bible classes in a miserable room over a stable in Elizabeth Street. He is now trying to buy a deserted church in Chrystie Street for the use of the school and for services for adults. The General contributes $1,000, and asks the Christian public to help him raise the balance—about $17,000.

The Chicago Tract Society is doing a hopeful work among the foreign-born population, which is notorious for its dangerous proclivities. Recently three hundred Poles were assembled and heard the Word of God. A large parcel of Polish tracts was distributed. As soon as it was known that the papers were in the Polish language, the eagerness among the adults to obtain the tracts was wonderful. One old man followed the wagon fully a mile to the stopping place, and when asked what he wanted breathlessly replied, "Give me a Polish tract."

The Northfield Training-School, opened by Mr. Moody last October, now has thirty-four students preparing for home and foreign mission work. Besides religious and theological instruction, these ladies are taught dressmaking, cooking, and other arts likely to make them useful in the homes of the poor and in heathen lands. The next term opens on January 6. Mr. Moody has a few scholarships for disposal, which cover the tuition for the coming term. Any one desiring further information may address Miss Gertrude Hulbert, "The Northfield," East Northfield, Mass.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Mormons to Migrate—An American Damascus—Another Church Burned—Emperor William to Visit Paris—The New Supreme Court Justice—Victimized Congressmen, Etc., Etc.

Since the Passage of the Anti-Polygamy Bill, the Mormons have begun to recognize the fact that they are out of place in this country, unless they are willing to abandon their unlawful practices. Although the present head of the Mormon Church some time ago issued a pronunciamento assuring the nation that his people were law-abiding, and that they had permanently surrendered their plural marriage system in obedience to law, it has been known that the system is still secretly in force, and that nothing short of the total removal of the Mormon hierarchy and its subjects from United States territory would eradicate the foul blot on our civilization. This conviction seems to have become settled in the minds of the Mormons themselves, for within a few weeks, John W. Young, the oldest son of Brigham, is said to have concluded the purchase of three million acres of land in Mexico, to which it is his purpose to emigrate, with all his followers. These lands are among the finest in Mexico, and the grant will allow the colonization of 10,000 people. A number of Mormons have already settled in the vicinity of the new location. Should the exodus take place, the Mexican Government will find its new subjects industrious and peaceful, as long as they are free to pursue their own practices, but liable ultimately to prove a thorn in the side of any nation that affords them shelter.

Some Forty Members of the august United States Senate and a number of other politicians have been victimized by a clever sharper named William Duvall, of East Baltimore. Duvall wrote to each a letter announcing the birth of a son and heir, who had been duly named in honor of the distinguished recipient of the letter. He enclosed a neatly engraved baptismal certificate, attesting this fact and also sent half a dozen tickets to an entertainment to be given in honor of the occasion, for which tickets the god-father was of course expected to pay. The good-natured statesmen—among whom were Vice-President Morton, Senators Manderson, Dolph, Everts, Higgins, Carlisle, Paddock, Squire, Wolcott, Edmunds, Pettigrew, Sanford, Sawyer, Stockbridge, Blair, Hoar, Hale, Washburn, Vest, and Hisecock—almost all responded by sending silver rings, spoons, cups, or crisp bank bills of various denominations, to the parent of the numerous named Duvall, who, in this way, received nearly $2,000. The fraud was discovered when Senator Manderson, of Nebraska, showed his letter to a fellow Senator who happened to have a similar missive in his pocket. Governors of several States have also been swindled in the same fashion by the astute Duvall, who is now eagerly sought after by the police.

Emin Pasha has lately Encountered a Series of misfortunes in his African explorations. Ever since his mishap at Cairo, when his leg was broken, the veteran explorer has experienced little else than trouble, and now the climax comes in the news that Gen. Wissman, the German commander, in Equatorial Africa, has resolved to keep Emin out of that country altogether, the Pasha having, it is said, conceived the idea of returning to his province and establishing himself there, in violation of the Anglo-German agreement.

One of the Most Extensive Labor Strikes of the closing year is now in progress in Scotland. Five thousand men employed on the various lines of railroad have struck for better wages and shorter hours, paralyzing traffic by rail throughout a very large section of the United Kingdom. At Glasgow, the centre of the strike, few trains are running. Pickets are stationed at many points to prevent new hands from taking the places of the old operatives. It is expected that within a week ten thousand men will be idle, including nearly all the operatives of the Caledonian, North British, and Southwest Companies. A few trains are running four hours behind time. The strike threatens to spread to the collieries, the furnaces, the sewing-machine shops, and other large interests, which may unite through sympathy. The condition of the labor market on the Continent is also causing much uneasiness. In Paris the season has been an exceedingly dull one, and in Berlin there are 60,000 laborers of both sexes idle, many with families dependent upon them. The activity of the Socialists in Berlin makes the situation there all the more discouraging.

The Supreme Court Vacancy, Caused by the death of Justice Samuel F. Miller, has been filled by the appointment of Henry Billings Brown, Judge of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan. (See portrait below.) It was thought that Attorney-General Miller would have been chosen for the post, and Judge Brown's appointment was somewhat of a surprise. The new Associate Justice has lived nearly all his life in Detroit. He was appointed to the Eastern District Judgeship by President Grant, in 1875, and is over 54 years of age. In his own State he is very popular, and has the reputation of being both able and upright. Two years ago he mortally shot a burglar who entered his house at night. The man died in prison a few months later from the effect of his wounds. The Establishment of an "American Damascus" is the project which just now engages the attention of a large majority of the 18,000 Armenians in this country. Most of them are engaged in trade, and have their headquarters in New York, while the whole are controlled by a sort of patriarchal government, peculiar to the East. Some have grown rich by the importation of Oriental goods. A syndicate of Armenian capitalists has been formed for the purpose of buying several thousand acres of land near the sea coast where silk culture, fruit growing and farming can engage the labor of the Syrian immigrants who are arriving in increasing numbers. Capital will be loaned to them by their prosperous fellow-countrymen, and they will be helped ultimately to buy the land for themselves. The location will be either in the South or Southwest.

After Two Years of Intermittent Warfare, Peace has been concluded between the Arab traders and the missionaries and agents of the African Lakes Company on the northern shores of Lake Nyassa. This section was formerly the greatest slave-hunting ground of the Arabs. The white station at Karonga on the northwest coast of the lake interfered with the traffic, and the Arabs made numerous attempts to destroy it. It was a heroic defence on the part of a mere handful of white Christians against several thousand fanatics, but so bravely was it conducted that the whites finally triumphed. The white leader, H. H. Johnston, with a single companion, lately met the Arabs by agreement and a treaty of peace was signed, under which the Arabs are bound to engage only in legitimate trade hereafter.

The Tide of Polish, Italian, and Hebrew Immigrants, which for the last fifteen years has steadily flowed to this country, has now turned, and is setting in toward the new republic of Brazil. Within a very short period 10,000 of these immigrants have settled in Brazil, and there is a prospect that during 1891 several millions of Italians, Poles, and Russian Hebrews will migrate to the same attractive country where many inducements are held out by the Government to newcomers. Their glowing letters to friends in Poland have started a great wave of immigration, which has seriously alarmed the landholders there, but they are unable to prevent the wholesale exodus of their people. Baron Hirsch, the millionaire banker-philanthropist, has offered to transport 500,000 Russian Hebrews to South America, and it is thought that Brazil will be their destination. Much of the finest territory of the new republic is in the hands of an idle and half savage population, partly Indian, and it is to replace those with an industrious and desirable class of citizens that the new immigration is encouraged.

Following Hard Upon the Destruction by Fire of Christ Church, in New York, a week ago, the Roman Catholic Church of St. Bernard's, in West Fourteenth Street, was almost wholly consumed by the same element on the night of the 23rd inst. Evening service had concluded and the doors of the edifice had been locked several hours, when one of the assistants, who slept on the third floor of the church, discovered flames in the basement. A number of priests hurried out of the place in time to save themselves from suffocation. Firemen turned on heavy streams of water, and battered down doors and windows in an effort to save the building, but the interior was gutted and little else left standing besides the walls. The loss will be about $100,000. St. Bernard's was the first church consecrated by an American Cardinal. Its pastor, Father Healy, has been connected with it since it was built in 1872. It was a massive structure of Ohio freestone, and contained several handsome memorial windows.

Emperor William Believes in Being Talked about. It was announced lately that he had decided to visit Paris, that he would go incognito and would not stop at the residence of the German Ambassador. This set the European press agog. The French officials were apparently mystified, as it would never do, they concluded to let so distinguished a visitor pass unnoticed, nor would it be wise to permit him to wander about the capital making observations which, to his practical mind, would be almost certain to be made strategically valuable in the event of trouble with France in the future. It was declared by the ministerial party that the presence in France of the ruler of the country that had torn Alsace and Lorraine from their allegiance would hasten a crisis which the friends of peace were anxious to avert. The German and French Chancellors have discussed the Emperor's project and it is not at all improbable that the French Cabinet may finally put a diplomatic veto upon it.

William J. Walter, One of the Survivors of the Sir John Franklin Search Expedition in the Fox, recently died at Strood, near Rochester, England. Mr. Hampton, a relative, also one of the crew of the Fox, wrote to their old Commander, now Admiral Sir Francis Leopold McClintock, who thus replied: "Dear Mr. Hampton, I had not heard of the death of Walter, and I thank you for having written to tell me of it. It has pleased God to spare us hitherto, and in this we see his continuing mercy still overshadowing us. May we employ extended opportunities in serving him before all men, openly and fearlessly. I think Dr. Walker (surgeon of the Fox) is still living, in the United States. He served for some years in the United States army. I will send your letter to Sir Allen Young who is, I believe, quite well. With every good wish, your friend, F. L. McClintock."

Russian Movements near Gallica on the Frontier of Austria, where a large Russian army has been massed for some time, are occasioning some anxiety in Austria. The number of surgeons with the Russian infantry has been greatly increased, many being sent from other regiments in the interior of Russia.

FAITH'S BAROMETER.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Even Feeble Faith Saves—Should Become Stronger—Teaching of the Two Narratives—I. Little Faith Gently Censured—Found Where We Expected Greater Thir—Too Eager for Signs—Affected by Surroundings—Speaks Unreasonably—Often Gets a Wetting—II. Little Faith Commended—True Faith if it is Little—III. Great Faith—Found Where Least Expected—Prays and Prevails—Brings a Blessing to Others.

"O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" Matthew 14: 31.

"O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Matthew 15: 28.

BETWEEN the very lowest degree of faith and a state of unbelief there is a great gulf. An abyss immeasurable yawns between the man who has even the smallest faith in Christ and the man who has none. One is a living man, though feeble, the other is "dead in trespasses and sins;" the one is a justified man, the other is "condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God." The weakest believer is on the road to heaven; the other, having no faith, is going the downward road, and he will find his portion at last among the unbelievers—a terrible portion indeed.

Although we thus speak of believers as all of one company, yet there is a great distance between weak faith and strong faith. Thank God, it is a distance upon the one safe road—the King's highway. No gulf divides little faith from great faith; on the contrary, little faith has only to travel along the royal road, and he shall overtake his stronger brother, and himself become "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." I want to quicken some of the tardy travellers along the sacred way.

I have read in your hearing two stories in the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of this Gospel according to Matthew. It is memorable that the incidents, illustrating little and great faith, come so closely together. I shall take it for granted that you have the stories of Peter and the Canaanitish woman clearly before your minds.

I. First, we have Little Faith Gently Censured.

What shall I say about it, to begin with, but this?—that it is frequently found where we expected greater things. This man who is chided for little faith is Peter. Peter to whom the Lord had communicated a very clear knowledge of himself; Peter the foreman of the twelve; Peter, in after-days the great preacher of Pentecost. It is Peter, to whom Jesus says, "O thou of little faith." And, my dear brother or sister, may it not be true that you have obtained great mercy, enjoyed high privileges, received gracious protection, and been eminently favored with fellowship with Christ, most near and dear? By this time you ought to be strong in faith. But yet you are not so. These things ought not so to be. You and I, who are no children now; you and I who are no longer coasters, but have launched out into the deep, and have had experience in many a storm: you and I, ought to be ashamed if we are still lamenting our little faith. It is an infirmity in which we cannot glory, for unbelief is exceeding sinful. Well might the Master lift his finger to some who are sitting in these pews this morning, and say to us, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?"

Continuing our very gentle censure, we note that little faith is far too eager for signs. I do not think that Peter's faith became suddenly little: it was always little, and the sight of the boisterous wind made its littleness apparent. When he said, "Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water," his faith was weak. Why did he want to walk on the water? Why did he seek such a wonder? It was because his faith was little. Joyful meditations, remarkable dreams, singular providences, choice answers to prayer, special fellowships—little faith must be having something out of the common, or she collapses. The perpetual cry of little faith is "Show me a token for good."

Weak faith is apt to have too high an opinion of its own power. "Oh," says one, "Surely you are wrong. Is it not to have too depreciating an opinion of its own ability?" Brethren, no man can have too low opinion of his own power; because he has no power whatever. Just in proportion as faith in our Lord is weakened, our idea of ourselves will be strengthened. Peter has an idea that he can go upon the water to his Master; he is not so sure of the others, but he is clear about himself, and he hurried to the front, as usual; hastened into a pathway that was quite unfit for his trembling feet to tread, and before long found out his error. It is weak faith that allows of high ideas of self. Great faith hides self under its mighty wings.

Note another point about weak faith: it is too much affected by its surroundings. Peter went on pretty well till he noticed that the winds tossed the waves about tremendously, and then he was afraid. Are not many Christians too apt to live by what they feel and see? Do we not often hear a young beginner say, "I know that I am converted for I feel so happy?" Well, but a new frock will make many a girl happy, or a few shillings in the pocket will make many a youth rejoice. Is this the best evidence that you can bring? Happiness is a thing that depends upon how things happen. It is too often hap-ness, and nothing more. It is too much a hap-hazard thing. But faith rests in Christ whatever hap may happen; and so it is happy in the happening of sorrow and grief, because it relies wholly upon God. Faith rests upon the Lord's faithful word and promise, come what may.

Much Rain.

"Ah!" says another, "I feel very low and dull. I am heavy even when I try to pray; I cannot pray as I would like." And so you doubt your salvation because of that, do you? Does your salvation depend upon the liveliness of your prayers? It is the mark of weak faith, that it is all up and then all down. God save us from being like the barometer, which at one time is "set fair;" but "set fair" with the barometer does not last long, it is back again to "rain," and it drops down to "much rain," before we know where we are. Strong faith knows where its true standing is, and, perceiving this to be unchanging, it concludes that its foundation is as good one day as another day; for its standing is in Christ. But poor weak faith is always looking out to see whether the wind is in the east; and if it be so, down she goes. Is the wind quiet? Peter walks on the wave. Does the wind howl? Peter begins to sink. This is weak faith all over. It pins us down to its environment. God help us to rise out of it!

Weak faith, when conscious of her danger, swings as a pendulum to the opposite extreme, and in an instant

Exaggerates Her Peril.

One moment Peter walks upon the sea; the next moment he is going to be drowned. It is a curious thing that he never thought of swimming. When the soul trusts Christ it is spoiled for reliance upon self. Self-confidence goes when confidence in Christ comes in. It was the Lord's will that Peter should know his weakness, and should most clearly see that his standing depended upon his faith, and that faith found all its strength in the Lord Jesus. Down goes Peter; and now it is, "Lord, save me." I have been foolish enough to feel that I should sink under trouble and need. It is folly. Having mixed up our confidence in brighter days, when dark days come, a large part of our confidence is gone, and we fear that we shall perish. In this way little faith forgets her Lord. She is too bold one day, and too timid another, and all because she mixes up her confidences.

Little faith speaks unreasonably. Notice how our Lord puts it: "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" Faith is spiritual common sense; unbelief is unreasonable. You cannot say of a man, "He is a faithful man, for you may at times rely upon his word." That qualifying word, "at times," is fatal to his character. Unless he is always to be relied upon, he is not an honest, true-speaking man. And if you say of God's promises, "I can believe some of them, and therefore I expect him to help me under certain difficulties," you are accusing the Lord of unfaithfulness. O sir, you are cutting away the foundation of what little faith you have. Your Lord might ask you, "Why do you believe as much as you do believe? Having gone so far, why do you not go on to the end? The reason which makes you believe as much as you do believe, should make you believe to a still greater degree. O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? If thou hast any faith, why dost thou doubt? If any doubt, why any faith?" The two things are inconsistent with each other.

One word more about our trembling apprehensions. Weak faith

Often Gets a Wetting.

Though Peter was not drowned, yet you may be sure he was soaked to the skin with the water. If you have strong faith you will often escape a sea of troubles, which weak faith will be immersed in. Weak faith is a great fabricator of terrors. I know friends who have a trouble factory in their back garden, where they are always making rods for their own backs. They disbelieve God about this and about that, and hence they are always fretting and worrying, and getting wet through with trouble. I have heard say that home-made clothes very seldom fit; and certainly, home-made troubles are very hard to bear. I have also heard that a home-made suit will last longer than other garments, and I believe that home-made troubles stick to us far longer than those which God appoints for us. Shut up that fear-factory, and make songs instead!

Thus have I very gently censured weak faith, I did not mean to hurt a hair of its head. It is a blessed thing, this little faith—not its littleness, but its faith. If I could kill the weakness, and quicken the faith; if the littleness could be removed and the faith could be increased, how glad should I be!

II. Now, little faith shall be Tenderly Commended.

I shall praise it, not because it is little, but because it is faith. Little faith requires to be tenderly handled, and then it will be seen to be a precious thing. For it is true faith. Faith which begins and ends with Jesus is true faith. The least faith in Jesus is the gift of God; and it is "like precious faith," though it is not like strong faith. A drop of water is of the same nature as the sea; a spark is fire as assuredly as the flames of Vesuvius. Nobody knows what may come of a spark of faith: behold, it sets a thousand souls on fire! O my hearer, "If thou believest that Jesus is the Christ, thou art born of God." If thou dost feebly cast thyself on Christ's finished work, thy weakness in the act of reliance does not alter the fact that thou hast fallen into strong hands, which will surely save thee.

Next, notice that little faith obeys the precept, and will not go a step without it. Peter's little faith did not try to walk upon the water until Jesus gave the word of permission. Peter asked, "Bid me come." Oftentimes have I noticed men and women much despondent, greatly fearful, and yet they would not do anything for the life of them, behind them saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it." They hesitate till they have consulted the map of the Word; they dare not go at a venture, but they kneel and cry for guidance, for they are afraid of taking even a single step apart from their Master's will. They have a holy dread of running without warrant from the Lord. Little faith, if this be thy mind and temper, we commend thee much!

And next, little faith struggles to come to Jesus. Peter did not leave the ship for the mere sake of walking the waters; but he ventured on the wave that he might come to Jesus. That was the one point he aimed at—to get to Jesus. Some of you, I know, have but little faith; but you long to get nearer to Jesus. Your daily panting is, "Lord, reveal thyself to me, reveal thyself in me, and make me more like to thee." Well, though thou be little in faith, yet I am glad thou art struggling, despite thy feebleness, to reach thy Lord. Struggle on, for Jesus comes to meet thee; and when thou dost begin to sink, through mistrust, he will set thee on thy feet again. Wherefore be of good cheer!

Little faith I must commend yet further; because when it finds itself in trouble it betakes itself to prayer. Peter begins to sink. What does Peter do? Peter prays: "Lord, save me." Little faith knows Where Her Strength Lies.

When she is in trouble, she does not then turn her face to human confidences, or natural forces; but she turns immediately to prayer. Little faith pours out her heart before the Lord. I love to see a man, in the hour of his distress, begin to pray at once, as naturally as frightened birds take to their wings. Some of you run to your neighbors, or hold a council with your own wits: but the profit of this course has never made you rich. Let us try a surer method. Instead of stopping to turn over all the old stock we have, let us go at once to Jesus for new help.

Once more, I commend little faith because, though it may sometimes sink, it recovers itself, and does its old wonders over again. Peter is ready to sink; but when his Master has caught him, what do you see? There is not one person now walking on the water; there are two. Christ is there, and Peter, too. Peter, my man, you walk on the sea as one to the manner born! Oh, yes; his little faith has learned, by a touch from the Lord, to do what it did at first: he walked the waves at first, and now he does it again. See! he comes up with his Lord into the ship. You that used to have good times, and at this hour look back upon them with deep regret, may have the like again. You that have grown despondent and sad, be of good courage; you shall have your festival days back again, and much brighter than they.

III. But now I want to say a few words to finish with; and this is the motto of them.

is much more commended. It is sometimes found where we least expected it. Our Lord beheld it, not in the manly Peter, but in the tender woman who pleaded for her child. She was a woman; but she had faith which put the men to shame. She was a woman who had great discomfort at home; for the devil was there, tormenting her daughter. It is a dreadful thing to have the devil in your husband, or a devil in your daughter, when you go home; yet many a Christian woman has this to bear. Notwithstanding this grave trial, though there was nothing to comfort her at home, she was a woman of great faith. And why should not we be like her?

Next, great faith is to be commended because it perseveres in seeking the Lord. This woman came to Jesus to have her daughter healed; and at first he answered her never a word. Oh, the misery of silent suspense! Next, he speaks coolly of her to his disciples; but she seeks on. She has come for a boon, and she so believes in the Lord, the Son of David, that she will not take "no" for an answer; she means to be heard, and so she presses her suit with importunity even to the end. Oh, for a strong,

A Persevering Faith!

Great faith also sees light in the thickest darkness. I do not think Peter was half so tried as the Canaanite was. What was it that frightened Peter? The wind. What might have frightened her? Why, the harsh words of Jesus himself. Who is afraid of the wind? Who would not be afraid of a rejecting Christ, speaking hard words? "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs." Why, if our Lord had spoken thus to any one of us, we should never have dared to pray again. We should have said, "No, that hard sentence shuts me out altogether." But not so strong faith. She pleads with him as readily as if he had given her a promise instead of a rebuff. Such a faith as this deserves to be commended, and our Lord himself praises it. "O woman, great is thy faith!"

She Prevailed.

Great faith prays and prevails. How she did prevail! Her daughter was made whole, and she received a broad grant of whatever she willed. "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." I wish we had this mighty faith in connection with prayer. One man praying with faith will get more from God than ten men, or, for the matter of that, ten thousand men, who are unstable and unbelieving. Believe me, there is a way of praying in which you may have what you will of God.

I commend strong faith, because Jesus, our Lord, was delighted with it. What music there was in his words, "O woman, great is thy faith!" There was no smile on his face when he said to Peter, "O thou of little faith:" it grieved him that his follower should have such little faith in him. But now it gladdened him that this poor woman had such splendid faith. He looks at her faith as jewellers do at some famous stone worth more than they can tell. "O woman," said he, "great is thy faith." How enriched that woman became! She had pleased her Lord, and then her Lord pleased her; "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." She went away the happiest woman under the skies.

A Blessing to Others.

What benefits we could confer upon others if we had strong faith! Her daughter was made whole. Mother, if thou hadst more faith, thy child would soon be brought to Jesus. Father, if thou hadst more faith, thy boy would not be such a plague to thee as he now is. Have more faith in thy God; and when thou dost treat thy Father better, thy children shall treat thee better. If thou wilt dishonor thy God by doubting him, do you wonder your children dishonor you by disobeying you? O preacher, if thou hadst more faith, thou wouldst have more converts! Sunday School teacher, if thou hadst more faith, more children would be brought to the Saviour out of thy class. Whosoever thou art, and whatever thou art, bring your burdens, and lay them at his feet, "casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you:" and henceforth may he never have to say to you, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" Oh, may he often exclaim, with joy, of you, "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt!" May the Holy Spirit bless these simple words to your edification? Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE transmission by Olof Ericsson of qualities that produced two such engineers as Nils and John Ericsson, is an illustration of the law of heredity, finding further examples in the department of engineering, in the German brothers Siemens, the French Brunels, Anthony Bessemer and his son Henry, the English Stephenson, father and son, and in the American family of Stevens. Nils, if less original, imaginative, and erratic than his brother, was hardly less able as an engineer within the lines of precedent. He was a man of industry and energy, of sterling integrity and public spirit and an excellent organizer, while his conservative and cautious temperament, and his skill in bending others to his purposes, enabled him to make the most of his opportunities. He retained his position on the Gotha Canal, when his brother left it in 1820, and gradually won his way to fame and fortune. He rose to the head of the canal corps, and after completing his work upon the water-ways uniting the Baltic and the North Sea—the "blue ribbon of Sweden"—he was called upon by the king to take charge of the construction of the system of government railways. This great work completed, he finally retired in 1862—the year in which his brother reached the culmination of his fame—with the title of baron and a pension larger than any before bestowed upon a Swedish subject.

Nils sought to persuade John to follow his example in withdrawing from active work, and urged him to return to dwell near him in the fatherland.

His Kind-heartedness.

When, in 1867, a terrible famine afflicted part of Sweden, Ericsson's generosity was without stint. Contributions were solicited from all countries and out of a total of nearly half a million crowns, the gifts from the United States amounted to $5,620. Of this Ericsson gave all but the odd twenty dollars, promptly sending a draft for £1,120, or 20,216 Swedish crowns. It was no perfunctory gift; his heart went with it. A Swedish traveller who visited him at this time tells how his voice choked, and tears filled his eyes as he spoke of the distress in his native land in tones that thrilled the listener. "It was like an orator, electric with inspiration, or a volcano seething with internal fires." With wise forethought, he stipulated that his gift should be devoted to the purchase of barley seed for distribution among the poor farmers of Norrland, choosing this as a grain best adapted to their soil and other conditions. "In case the sum should not be sufficient to pay the freight," he said in sending his munificent contribution, a fortune in Swedish eyes, "the relief committee is hereby authorized to draw a bill on me at sight to meet the deficiency." He urged that supplies be sent forward without delay, lest the frozen sea should shut out approach, and added, "Let us not be content with giving assurance that life can be sustained on herbs not intended by nature for the food of human beings. Bags of meal will be more welcome among the unfortunates, than good advice as to gathering coral-moss for winter food."

Ericsson and Ole Bull.

In his way, Ericsson was fond of music, and would whistle at his work like a black-bird. A street organ that had a musical note in it could not pass his window without calling him from his work. On one occasion his attention was arrested by musical sounds. Supposing them to come from some vagrant violinist, he went to his window; no one was to be seen. Suddenly the truth dawned upon him, and with characteristic impetuosity he exclaimed, "It is Ole Bull!" and rushed downstairs, two steps at a time, and into the arms of the great performer, to whom he administered a hearty Norse hug.

Then Ericsson discovered that he was the victim of an amiable little plot. Mrs. Bull, it appears, had sought an introduction, and as Ericsson had never found leisure for this, she had enlisted on her behalf one of his few intimate friends, Mrs. E. H. Stoughton. The two ladies persuaded their husbands to join them in their little scheme, and the quartette went to Ericsson's house. The door was opened by a faithful housekeeper, Ann, who had been carefully trained to stand guard over her master's privacy. Mrs. Stoughton, who was well-known to her, hurried the bewildered servant into a back room, where Mr. Stoughton and the two female conspirators hid themselves, while the sweet strains of Ole Bull's violin enticed Ericsson from his seclusion.

A Heroic Discipline.

Until within a few days of his death, he followed a rigid regimen. The food and drink constituting his simple diet, were chosen with care and measured with exactness. The window of his sleeping-room must be open just so many inches, summer and winter; he must have his calisthenics for two hours each morning, followed by a sponge bath and vigorous rubbing; as plumbing was one of the antipathies, there was no bathroom in the house. "I have important work before me," he wrote, after he had passed his eighty-second year, "and hence I live like a man training for a fight. My reward is unbroken health. I digest my food as well now

A Deputation of Irish Leaders Conferring with Mr. Gladstone.

I did at thirty. Nor is my muscle less tough and elastic than at that age." This view of his bodily conditions was, as I have said, somewhat optimistic, although true as to the general fact.

Captain Ericsson abandoned the use of intoxicants when he was fifty years old, as he once told me. His usual beverages were water cooled in summer with ice to a temperature of 15 to 20 degrees below that of the air, and hot tea made very strong. While he lived in England, he followed the custom of the country; this he describes as at that time a continuous round of eating and drinking. He seems, later, to have acquired a prejudice against drinking habits.

A Christian's Death-bed.

At nine P. M., Wednesday, March 6th, I took the housekeeper to his bedside, to bid him good-night, as she had never failed to do for thirty years and more. I imagine that blindness was coming on, as he could not see her uplifted hand. He gently squeezed her finger and said, "God bless you, my child!"

Thursday, March 7th, Dr. Boulee reported that when he felt it to be his duty to inform the Captain of his very precarious condition, he merely remarked, "Then give me rest!"

At 11.30 P. M., I arranged his pillow and spoke to him. He gazed into my face and said:

"I am resting. This rest is magnificent; more beautiful than words can tell."

I am positive that he was absolutely without pain, and perfectly conscious, when I left, a minute later. At 12.30 A. M., I was called to see him breathe his last, and at 12.39 A. M., with just three gentle movements of the lips, the noble friend, and good man, ended his life.

IRISH LEADERS CONSULTING MR. GLADSTONE.

NO foreign topic has been so prominent during the past few weeks in the minds and conversation of American citizens as the Irish difficulty. It has engrossed public attention and has given rise to no little dispute. Our people have a warm sympathy for Ireland of which, time and again, they have given substantial proofs. The present dissension among the Irish leaders, and the calamity it involves are, therefore, acutely deplored here. The solid phalanx of Irish members of Parliament struggling to obtain redress for the grievances of Ireland commanded our admiration. We admired the skill with which they had been so manoeuvred as to hold the balance of power between the English parties, and we hailed with joy the brighter prospects which came to them when Mr. Gladstone championed their cause. Now, all those bright prospects are overcast and the hopes of achieving success are blighted. And the cause of the catastrophe is so miserable, so shameful, so disgraceful! One man's sin has blighted the hopes of a whole nation.

The Irish leaders have acted in a characteristic manner in the difficulty. They have fallen out among themselves, and there is an amusing significance in the fact that the first bitter fight should have taken place in Kilkenny. The Irish members apparently saw no reason in the scandal in which Mr. Parnell played so disgraceful a part, for deposing him from the leadership. They re-elected him, knowing all the facts. When, however, they found that Mr. Gladstone declined to act with him, they appealed to him to retire. They wanted him to sacrifice his position for the sake of his country's interests. They realized that without the help of Mr. Gladstone and his followers they could not hope to achieve Home Rule for Ireland and they begged Mr. Parnell to remove the hindrance to their gaining that help. He refused, and bluntly declared that he knew what Mr. Gladstone would do for Ireland and it was not worth having. If Mr. Gladstone would undertake to advocate a scheme of Home Rule satisfactory to the Irish people, he would retire. Thereupon a deputation waited upon Mr. Gladstone to inquire what he would do. (See illustration.)

Mr. Gladstone undertook to advocate such liberal concessions as Ireland has long been asking, but not all that she wants. The majority of the Irish members thought this promise sufficient, but Mr. Parnell would not yield. He contended that he had led the Irish forces with such ability that he had made the Irish party a power in Parliament. He had done this without Mr. Gladstone's help and he was ready to continue the fight. He appealed to the people of Ireland. At this opportune moment there was a vacancy to be filled. A new member of Parliament was to be elected in Kilkenny, and to that district the fight was transferred. Mr. Parnell and his friends nominated Scully; Mr. McCarthy, the rival leader, and his friends nominated Hennessey, and the people of Kilkenny were invited to express by their votes their judgment of Parnell's position. The voting took place on Dec. 23, after scenes of outrageous violence, and ended in the signal defeat of Mr. Parnell's candidate, who polled but little more than half the number of votes cast for his rival.

OLD CRUSTY'S NIECE.

A SERIAL STORY.
BY REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

"GEORGE," said his mother, as they sat at tea, "I am sad at heart about Nora Mansford. I have done my best to trace her trouble to its cause, but I cannot say that I have succeeded. She is sad and sorrowful; she is sick, too; every day, as it seems to me, she visibly declines. And yet she makes no complaint; and in answer to my sympathetic question she has nothing but thanks for my interest in her, and that she is bound to carry her burden alone. My fear is that she will sink under it. I saw her and spoke to her in the High Street to-day, and I declare she looked more like death than life."

George listened in silence, and sat for some moments as if intently listening still, with tea and toast untouched; then speaking suddenly and earnestly, he replied:

"Mother, if you can't influence her—if you can't help her, nobody can. She loves you, for she told me so. She says she could trust you with her life. What keeps her silent, she says, is that someone else is involved—and that she must not, dare not speak. Then a wild, dazed, hunted look settles on her face, as she says, 'O, dear, what am I saying?' And the impression she makes on one would lead one to fear the worst. Oh! I could smite the mean cur—"

What else he could do he had no opportunity to say. He was evidently getting excited. His mother laid her hand upon his arm. It silenced him. It always did.

"George, who is the cur, as you call him? Is he a cur? And why should you haste to do the smiting?"

Awkward questions these to ask of a man who has been doing the smiting, and to some purpose, too, as a glance at the lower part of Gerald Towneley's face just at that moment would have shown.

"Whom do you suspect?" persisted Mrs. Appleton.

"Why, young Towneley. Who else can it be?"

"That I can't tell, George," said his mother, seriously, "but I do not believe it is he."

George looked at her with wonder, and then away from her with a frown.

"I shouldn't have thought there was room for two opinions about that, mother. Both facts and appearances are dead against him," said George, who refused to conceive himself mistaken.

"Facts may be misinterpreted," said Mrs. Appleton, quietly, "and appearances are deceitful. You can't talk five minutes with Nora Mansford without being struck with the candor of her words and tone, and, as I think, the transparent innocence of true girlhood on every feature of her face. I, for one, fully and finally refuse to link even the possibility of aught unwomanly with Nora Mansford's name. Even if it should be Gerald Towneley who is involved in this mystery, it is possible that the vital interests of some innocent third party are concerned—in short, call Nora Mansford unfortunate, unwise, imprudent, if you please, it may be true—but—"

"A woman's instincts are seldom wrong," said George. "But, mother, if it be so, then it is more than ever incumbent on you, for Nora's sake, to reach the truth. She must be saved from the perils of her own imprudence, for her good name is at stake; and if her sorrow can be lessened by being shared, you must share it; and if we can end it, we will: won't we mother?"

"I'll do my best, George," said his mother.

"Thank you, mother; so will I," George answered.

Mother and son thoroughly understood each other, and George Appleton found more pleasure in his books that evening than he had done for many a day.

The next day was Sunday. Mother and son sat at their morning meal. Each had thoughts in unison with the morning, though they were mingled with the disturbing thoughts with which they parted yester-even. The compact had been prayed over; both felt the presence and the power of a benediction; both saw the gleaming wings of hope in the Sabbath heaven. Peace came to mother and son. Then the sound of the "church-going bell" called them to the house of God, and there as aforetime in their private chamber, prayers for Nora, as for themselves, were sent up to heaven. In this they were not alone, for half screened by a massive pillar from the public view, sat the stranger tenant of the "Hermitage," and he, too, knowing full well how to call upon his God, and knowing, too, that heart-prayer for the sad and sorrowing, the erring and needy, always wins the ear of heaven, asked that Nora's stumbling feet might be strengthened and directed by a Father's hand.

In the quiet afternoon George betook himself to the fields on which the mellowing sunlight brooded, to ponder, as his wont was, on high and holy things, with Nature for a book and the Spirit for a teacher. Strolling slowly along the meadow path, he came to a place where lay athwart the trunk of a fallen elm. Three companion trees had resisted the storm that had laid their prostrate comrade low, and now formed a grateful shade to any who chose to find on it a temporary resting place. It was to George a favorite resort, and here many a time he had sat for hours. The tenant of the "Hermitage," Mr. Magrath, as he was called, had already taken possession of the prostrate trunk, and, having managed to dispose himself between two dead boughs, was seated with very much comfort to himself. Since that memorable occasion when George and the stranger had communed together in green fields of God and nature, with a daisy as the text, Mr. Magrath seemed very willing to cultivate the young man's acquaintance. He had met him, casually as it seemed, in all sorts of unexpected places, had even visited the class of which George had charge in the Literary Institute of the town, and more than once had heartily invited him to his own house. He therefore welcomed George's approach and motioned to him to take a seat beside him on the fallen trunk, saying he wanted a talk with the young man. "And so at last you and Abram Hardale have parted company," said Magrath. "Well, I imagine he's rather a cantankerous individual to get on with."

George looked at the speaker with some degree of wonder. It was not the first time that he had been surprised at the amount of information the stranger possessed about matters that were far from being generally known.

"May I ask how you came to be informed of that? I have only known it myself a day or two," said George.

"Ha, ha! You forget that a little rural townlet like Settleworth is so perfect a whispering gallery, that news arrives fast. Besides you know that the 'Hermitage' is 'haunted'; and if I give free lodgings to the ghosts, it is but fair that they favor me with a little information about my neighbors. Well, you have left the old cynic's employment. What next?"

George was instantly reminded of his own question to that effect only yesternight. He was in of mind now than then. Content and hope were in the ascendant now, so he hastened to reply, "The opening of another door by him who holds the keys."

He spoke reverently but confidently, for unlike many, whose creed includes full faith in Providence, he took God at his word, taking no "anxious thought for the morrow," simply trusting, that is all.

The heart of his companion warmed to the sterling sentiment. "Right," said he. "He knows which door to open, and at what time to lift the latch. I am thinking of making certain considerable alterations and repairs at the 'Hermitage.' If you will undertake them, I shall be heartily obliged to you, if you will."

"I thank you heartily," said George, "but I do not propose to take any of Abram Hardale's work from him. On the whole he has been a liberal and considerate employer, and I will not work him harm."

"That is spoken like yourself," was the reply. "I should have expected no other course of conduct from you. In this case, however, you need have no scruples, for I should not have given him the work or had it done just now but for this. I think it is the 'Open Door,' and if it is, you must enter in. Come to me to-morrow and let us talk the matter over."

George agreed to this; the conversation turned into another channel, and of so pleasant and profitable a nature, that it was not till the gathering dark and the chill of the evening air reminded them of the lateness of the hour that they bent their steps homeward.

"The door is opening, mother, I think. I shall know to-morrow." That is what George said when his mother and he were seated by their cosy fireside. "To-morrow" proved the truth of George's intention. The alterations were undertaken; but George Apple- was not aware of the still larger and more serious task which his new friend proposed to entrust to his charge.

While George was at work at the Hermitage, Gerald Towneley was busily plotting revenge for the blow he had received. But first he must see Nora. He set out towards Hardale's house intending to wait until he caught sight of Nora or Tabitha. But he was on the wrong side of the house; for presently Nora came out and walked briskly in the opposite direction. Towneley followed her as soon as he could, but did not overtake her till she reached Mrs Appleton's garden gate, opened it, and closed it after her without one look at the astonished and disappointed Adonis whose flattering words of greeting were already trembling on his tongue. "Sold!" said the young exquisite. For a moment he paused as if he were debating whether or not to follow her. Possibly the fear of George Appleton's digits decided him, for he gave his mustache a vicious twist or two and turned away.

Nora Mansford had not visited at the cottage just lately for reasons of her own. Whatever these were, we may be sure that any lessening of her regard and love for the excellent and kindly widow was not one of them. Widow Appleton was a good deal startled by Nora's sudden and unceremonious entrance. The girl was red and flurried, and sank upon the nearest chair without a word. Then she turned pale and faint; Mrs Appleton opened the door to give her a little air, and took that opportunity to look down the lane for the reason of the flurry. She saw Gerald Towneley strolling towards the town. For a moment her face was clouded. Forgetful of her noble vindication of the girl before George, she really did fear that all was not right. Nora and the young squire had a secret between them, she thought, and her soul was grieved within her. The next moment, true to her faith in the sad and lonely orphan-girl, she banished the idea, and asked her God as she re-entered the cottage to give her power with the maiden for her good. "Are you better, dear?" said she, smoothing the girl's jet black locks from her brow, which was all but marble white. "What's the matter, darling? Tell me."

"O, it's nothing, dear Mrs. Appleton. I've not been well lately, you know, and I felt faint. I shall be better directly;" and making a strong effort as if to shake it off, she looked in the widow's kindly and sympathetic face, and tried to conjure up a smile.

It was a sad failure, and there was no answering smile, only a look of love and pity beaming through a cloud that betokened disappointment and pain. The widow's heart was sad; Nora's answer was evasive to say the least of it, and having seen what she saw at the garden gate, she asked herself, was it intended to be deceptive? "It's nothing," the girl had said, and yet she herself had certainly seen the young squire, with whose name Nora's was harshly coupled by public rumor, passing away from the door!

Nora saw the cloud and felt it. Now, she feared, as she looked at the widow's half reproachful face, that by some means, she, too, had gained an inkling of her secret, as George had seemed to have, and that the knowledge was making a gap between them never to be bridged again.

"Nora," said the widow, taking the girl's listless fingers in her own, while with the other hand she pressed the fair young head against her heart; "I am very sad for you; God knows it is in my heart to suffer with you, to soothe you, to help you as a mother would. You are nursing some secret grief, and it is draining all your life away. If it is something wrong that you have done, can't you trust me so far as to tell me, that I may pray for you, advise you, help you? Nora, dear, tell me; what is the matter!"

"O, I wish I could! I wish I could!" said the poor girl hysterically, "You are right, it will kill me. It is killing me: and O, how I wish it would!"

"Hush dear, hush. That you must not wish; but think of me as your mother, darling, and tell me as you would have told your own," pleaded the widow.

Nora was silent, she half lifted her face to Mrs. Appleton's as if about to speak, then buried it again in her hands, saying in a perfect agony of distress:

"O, Heaven, what must I do? I would rather tell you than anybody in the world; but I have promised, I have taken a vow to keep it a secret. What am I saying? Let me go! I must go!" And pushing her true friend away from her, she rose to her feet as if to rush to the door; then suddenly she threw her face downwards on the sofa, clasped her hands over her head, and lay still as a stone, stricken, tearless, speechless, almost dead.

Mrs. Appleton stood by the girl's prostrate form; with clasped hands and uplifted eyes. She prayed aloud to God that he would graciously and in pity undertake for the orphan, unlock her torturing secret, and show to her who dearly loved her how to help her in her desperate need.

By-and-by the tension of Nora's nerves relaxed and she wearily moaned as she changed her position a little on the couch. Then as if possessed by a sudden thought, she sprang up, sat upright, smoothed her disheveled hair, dried her eyes, looked with intense affection, at the kind-hearted widow, and said:

"Mrs. Appleton, I did wrong to come here. I did it because, because George advised it. But I ought to bear my burden alone. It is shameful and wicked for me to make you suffer. My lips are locked, or I would pour my whole soul out before you. Pray for me. Dear, dear friend, pray for me. See," she continued, with a forced smile, "your prayer has helped me. I pray for myself, but it is of no use."

"It's always of 'use,' Nora; and where it's offered in a right spirit, it gets its answer somehow, though we may have to wait for it. But I am afraid that you yourself are the cause of your own prayers remaining unanswered. God in his goodness has put it into our power to help each other, and to put a blessing on the doing of it. Whatever you may think or say, there are those who would be glad, very glad, to help you. But you never give us the chance. You keep your cares to yourself even while they are eating your heart out, and the claims of other people to sympathize with and aid you, you coldly put on one side. Nora, dear, it is not kind to them, neither is it fair or wholesome for yourself."

Nora listened to all this in silence. She knew that it was true; she knew that George Appleton and his mother were both true and kind—of single eye and heart in all love and duty. She was beginning to ask herself the question, "Shall I tell?"

Widow Appleton seemed to perceive the advantage she had gained, for she followed it up instantly.

"I am going to ask you a question, Nora," she said.

Nora flinched; made a sort of deprecating motion with her hand, and lifted appealing eyes to the face of her friend. "Of course you need not reply to it unless you choose," said Mrs. Appleton, who was not going to spare her now; "But I tell you plainly that if you don't it will sadden and grieve me more than I can tell."

Nora's lips whitened; her fingers began to move nervously, and in a tone that went straight to the widow's heart, she said, "O, how I wish I may!"

"Has your secret—the thing which is giving you so much pain and grief, and which is making us all so sad for your sake—tell me, has it anything to do with young Gerald Towneley, of the Chase?"

HOUGHT THE MISSIONARIES WERE GODS.

LAST summer, Mr. and Mrs. McKittrick, two missionaries in Africa, sailed in a small river steamer, the Henry Reed, up the Zambesi in search of a suitable site for a new station, the third of the Balolo Mission. Mrs. McKittrick says: "This afternoon we voyaged in our steamboat to a landing-place in the forest, and in a few minutes three or four figures emerged from the woods. The number gradually increased, and we rejoiced to know that we had arrived at the district of Bougondanga. Our reception by the natives was friendly. No white man has ever visited Bougondanga; no wonder then if our sudden coming startled and amazed the inhabitants. They could not understand who we were or where we came from. Our men had told them that we were not the dreaded Bula Matadi, and they concluded that we must be some kind of supernatural being, and called us 'God' or 'the younger brother of God.' Poor creatures! In a very short time friendly relations were established between ourselves and the natives, they went off to the towns near to bring us food, and we held a market on the beach. Provisions seem to be abundant, and we bought fifty or sixty fowls in as many minutes. Fear once removed from the minds of the people they became very bold, and gave us no peace until darkness came on and a few drops of rain warned them that storm was at hand. Then they dispersed rapidly, and sitting on the beach we sang the familiar evening hymn, 'Saviour, breathe an evening blessing.' The words 'Angel guards from Thee surround us' seemed in our circumstances to possess much force, and came to us as a sweet and comforting assurance. Here in the midst of savages we are compassed about with heavenly hosts. The king, in common with his followers, was greatly pleased when we suggested that a white man should come and live among them."

A DOG WATCHES OVER HIS MASTER'S GRAVE.

A MONUMENT has just been erected on Helvellyn, in Wales, to the memory of Charles Gough, who, in the year 1805, was killed by falling from the high crags on the ridge that joins Striding Edge to the summit; and of the faithful dog who for three months watched over her master's remains. Sir Walter Scott describes the event in the poem, "I climbed the dark brow of the mighty Helvellyn," and Wordsworth records it in his lines on "Fidelity." The young man was returning to Wythburn, where he lodged, from a fishing excursion in Patterdale. The accident was probably caused by a false step, during a binding hailstorm or a dense fog that day.

It happened on April 18, and on July 20 his bones were found, still watched by the starving dog, a little yellow rough-haired female terrier. She had given birth to puppies, which were found dead by the side of the corpse. It is believed, though unable to secure enough food for milk for her young, she maintained life by bits of carrion sheep which are not unfrequently found on the hills; but she might have had to range far and wide during her three months' watch. The mere fact that the bones were found intact serves to prove the assertion that the dog did not touch the remains of her master, for dogs break the bones to suck the marrow. The animal died a few years afterward at Kendal.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

A Gem For The Little Folks.

THE STORY OF JESUS For Little Children. By MRS. G. E. MORTON. Fully Illustrated. 12mo. 316 Pages. Cloth, Printed in Colors, $1.00, post-paid.

"Told in simple words and a very handsome book. How wonderful that the biography of the Son of the Highest is better adapted than any other to be told to little children. Angels study it; devines dive into it; babes love it. Blessed be the Story of Jesus."—C. H. SPURGEON.

"The demand for a fourth edition of this pleasant and instructive work shows that it has already met with considerable favor. Planned something on the same lines as the 'Peep of Day.' Several illustrations and an attractive binding add to its value as a Sunday-school prize or children's reward book."—The Book-seller.

"A difficult task well executed in simple, but not childish language, the 'old story' is told once more. The holiness of our Lord, and the great object of His life are kept in prominence, while his intercourse with all classes is described in a life-like way. We heartily recommend the book, which is improved by neat wood-cuts."—The Christian.

NEW ENLARGED EDITION

207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book specially to be recommended for young, wandering doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart to you, in the name of the Lord, from one who has doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus. I earnestly hope that in my more may be benefited.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put in the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the intellect, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation to the motive in love to cultivate faith in God."
